Having the Bulge

A Long Island farmer occupied a seat ahead of me in the passenger coach, and as he opened a newspaper and began reading he fell to grinning and chuckling and slapping his leg. Thinking he had struck something rich, I leaned forward and asked what it was.

"Say, I'm reading about them Japs," he said with a laugh. "A feller here is telling what they could do in case of war."

"And what does he make out?"

"Why, that they could destroy San Francisco, Denver, Chicago, Buffalo, New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore and New Orleans in a week. I've just come from Brooklyn and I tell you they are on the shiver up there. They are selling straw hats for half-price because they are afraid they'll be bombarded."

"But where does the laugh come in?" I asked as he guffawed again.

"Right here, stranger. I live in the town of Yaphank. It's ten miles from the railroad and twelve from Sound. It's hidden away among the hills and hollers. It's surrounded by woods. The Japs couldn't find it in a month of Sundays."

"Well?"

"Well, we hain't on the shiver there. We are standing right up and talking back and telling the Japs to come on if they dare. Do you know what I'm going to do when I get home today?"

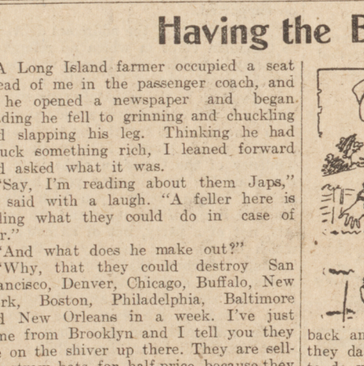

"Hardly."

"We haven't got any Japs there, but we've got old Jim Brady, who bought twenty yards of Japanese matting for his parlor last week. I'm going up to old Jim and shake my fist under his nose, and dare him to knock a chip off my shoulder, and tell him that he and his durned country can bombard and be durned to 'em, and that we can lick her in three minutes with one hand tied behind us."
