PROF. GERALD B. SMITH, PH. D., ON SCIENCE AND THEOLOGY

A Frank Treatment of the Subject by a Theologian of Chicago at the Congregational College in Montreal.

(Montreal Witness.)

Professor Gerald B. Smith, Ph. D., of Chicago, the distinguished theologian, who is this week giving a series of lectures at the Congregational College under the auspices of the McKeehan Lectureship, opened the course last evening by dealing with what he termed "The crisis in Protestant theology." His lecture proved to be one of exceptional interest, both to the students and to the various members of the outside public who also attended, in that it dealt with the effects which the modern view of the Bible as a fallible book were having on the Protestant religion.

He first briefly sketched the historical events leading up to the modern critical attitude in regard to the Scriptures, pointing out that Protestantism grew out of Roman Catholicism, and in its theology shares very largely the elements of Roman Catholicism. Now the Roman Catholic theology was a more or less pictorial. The Catholic thought of the universe exactly as the men in Biblical times thought of it—as a flat earth roofed in by the sky, and having a subterranean department. Heaven was the other world beyond the sky, and the supreme question of questions to him was how he might have authentic information about that other world, so that he might know better how to live his life here in preparation for it. The Catholic attitude was like that of fishes in water who could only get information about the world above the water by one of the beings in that world taking the form of a fish and going down in the water to communicate that information to them. Thus the Revelation, in the sense of its being an authentic message, has preserved the lack of Protestant religion and lost the heart of it.

Nothing was more interesting, the lecturer went on to say, than to see the way in which the word infallible was quietly dropping out of the theological vocabulary. It had already, in fact, almost vanished from the theological vocabulary. "Does that man mean that God is banished from the world? Does it mean that we have no word of God—no book that we can read and feel as though God is speaking to us? Luther and Calvin would say, 'Here stand I. I can do no other, so help me God.' And the man who today would preserve the form of Luther's theology without putting in the forefront that heroic spirit of inner courage, has preserved the lack of Protestant religion and lost the heart of it."

ture, and the real question today was, could they now say that the inner voice of the Spirit actually authenticated to them the word of the Scripture as the word of God? They, many of them, could not, for the growth of the modern and critical spirit had, even by the eighteenth century, led men very generally to doubt the doctrine of an infallible Bible. Out of that critical spirit had come the statement familiar to us today that 'A thing is not true because it is in the Bible, but a thing is in the Bible because it is true.'

THE CRISIS OF TODAY.
What would be the consequences on taking on ourselves, on human reason, the right to test what was authentic in the Bible? That was one of the great questions of today, for the moment they allowed human scholarship to decide whether the Scriptures were true or not, they opened the door to the absolute elimination of the Bible as a book of authority. That was the crisis in Protestant theology. Whether they were constructive or destructive critics, they were appealing to human reason, and if today they had in their hands the form of the old doctrine, they had arrived at them by a method which the original Protestantism would have repudiated.

"What was it," asked the lecturer, "which made Luther a Protestant? It was the inner conviction which led him to say, 'Here stand I. I can do no other, so help me God.' And the man who today would preserve the form of Luther's theology without putting in the forefront that heroic spirit of inner courage, has preserved the lack of Protestant religion and lost the heart of it."

GAIN FROM THE MODERN VIEW.
"Yet, if they came to study the matter he thought they would find that while they had lost the old sense of the infallibility of the Bible, they had gained much to compensate for that. No one could read an exposition on the books of the prophets of the Old Testament in modern scholarship, and compare it with the handbooks of a few years ago, without discovering with a thrill of delight that he was for the first time making the acquaintance of this Word of God. They used to take isolated texts and try to puzzle out what they meant. Now they lived over again the wonderful spirit that projected itself through the life of Israel; they lived over again the wonderful transition that was going on through the belief in God not as the political sovereign of one little tribe, but as the great Father of all men, who had chosen this tribe that the world might know him through them. What a splendid transformation of the idea of God wrought out in the lives of men that history gave them! And how real it had become to them!"

"We are frankly going back," he said, "to human religious experience, and finding with delight how much there is in it that we should never have discovered without the latter-day method of study. That does not quite mean that we have lost God out of the world, but it means that instead of a God who remains hidden from us behind the sky, and only occasionally visits the world with a miraculous word of revelation, we have welled up out of history a God expressing himself in human life. Instead of looking up to heaven at a vanishing figure of God and there alone, our eyes have turned inward to the heart of man where God speaks. Be sure the voice does not speak infallibly in your heart or in mine. But we can have a genuine, true religious faith even if the word infallible has gone."

EVE OF A GREAT REVIVAL.

In concluding the lecturer showed how the popularizing of natural science had altered men's outlook on the universe, and how the popular imagination now was occupied with all kinds of scientific problems instead of on speculation about the end of the world. The result was that this had become tremendously interesting. People, instead of looking on themselves as pilgrims and strangers here, were so engrossed in the problems of this life that he supposed most of them would say they would like still to be here in a hundred years time to see what was going on. What was the upshot of it all? He thought there never was in the history of the world a period when conscientious and honest theology faced so much perplexity. Oh, for the days when it was so simple and so easy to find God and be religious! Oh, that they might get rid of this modern doubt and perplexity! All honor to those who kept them from throwing aside the old beliefs too hastily, lest something too precious to be lost were lost.

This perplexity was not peculiar to Protestantism. Roman Catholicism had the same thing to face. The present Pope was trying with all the strength of his official position to keep Romanism true to the old world picture, and the remarkable thing was that in spite of the tremendous pressure brought to bear on every loyal Catholic to remain true to his church there were so many men in that church speaking out boldly in opposition to that spirit of the Pope. Whether they like it or not the crisis was here, and it behooved them as men to meet it.

As an antidote to any pessimism regarding religion, he drew attention to the theological activity of today. The number of text-books published in the United States during last year was greater than the books on any other subject, and the percentage of books on theology increased more than the percentage of any other books. As a great French theologian said, 'Man is incurably religious. Destroy one religion and he will have another.' He thought that if they met the crisis of today as they ought to meet it, if they sympathetically tried to understand the problems of today, and to deal with them, instead of facing the decline of religion, they were really on the eve of one of the greatest revivals in religion the world has ever known.

DANGEROUS PURGATIVES

Many People Ruin Their Health
Using Purgatives in Spring.

A spring medicine is an actual necessity. Nature demands it, as it does to carrying off the impurities that have accumulated in the blood during the winter months. Thousands of people recognizing the necessity of a spring medicine dose themselves with harsh, gripping purgatives. It is a serious mistake. Ask any doctor and he will tell you that the use of purgative medicine weakens the system, but does not cure disease. In the spring the system needs building up—purgatives weaken. The blood should be made rich, red and strong. In the spring the system needs building up—purgatives weaken. The blood should be made rich, red and strong. In the spring the system needs building up—purgatives weaken. The blood should be made rich, red and strong.

Mrs. Joseph Lepage, St. Jerome, Que., says: "My daughter suffered from headache and dizziness. Her appetite was poor. She had no strength and this and pale as a sheet. A neighbor advised the use of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, and after taking a couple of boxes we could see an improvement in her condition. She used the pills for some weeks longer when they fully restored her health, and she is now enjoying the best health she ever did." Try Dr. Williams' Pink Pills this spring if you want to be healthy and strong.
