MONEY AND THE STOCK MARKET

Hesitation is Still the Prevailing Factor, Say New York Brokers.

(New York Journal of Commerce.) The question is frequently asked why the Wall Street district is not with all the surplus funds in the banks and the superabundance of money generally, it does not seek the stock market. The office partner of one of the largest Wall Street brokers was asked this question yesterday, and he replied: "People are too timid." He thought his own personal experience was probably entirely typical of the general situation. During the panic he carried out an amount of investment stocks for his own account, and sold them out at a slight profit at the reaction that followed. He has been loaning his money to his own firm ever since, and has always hesitated to reinvest it, probably, he believes, because he has found such general hesitation among his own customers. Hesitation has been the prevailing factor in Stock Exchange circles ever since the panic, he said yesterday, "and this feature, in view of the actual situation, seems to be increasing rather than diminishing. I personally do not believe that I shall make any important purchases until very near election day; at any rate, when I think look favorable. I presume nearly everybody connects with Wall Street in a professional way will be buyers."

But there appears general agreement in Stock Exchange circles that money is not to be an important handicap to any stock market speculation that may take place during the balance of the year. "The money factor is being called as a result of the necessities of the trust companies and the prospective withdrawal of government funds is merely a matter of routine and does not affect the main situation, the fundamental feature of which is that trade and industry are generally at low ebb and do not require—and will hardly require this year—so then quota of either cash or credit. Industrial concerns have made their collection and have not manufactured additional goods and have not contracted to manufacture them; and to this extent their working capital is available and is to a considerable extent on deposit with their banks. Of course, should trade and industry start up suddenly the banks would soon find it necessary to apply finance to this class of customers, but as one bank officer said to a representative of this journal yesterday, "There is no reason to suppose that either trade nor industry is likely to start up in a substantial form until after the election and even then the improvement would be gradual."
