THE WOLF AND THE LAMB

One day as the Wolf was prowling along the edge of the forest in search of his dinner he observed a young and tender Lamb that had strayed away from the flock. He dared not rush upon her for fear of the Shepherd and the Rams, and he therefore resorted to strategy. Creeping up to his victim and keeping himself hidden as much as possible, he announced:

"Good morning, little Lamb. You are out all by your lonesome this morning."

"Yes; I am taking a little walk in hopes to find a four-leaf clover for my dolly," was the reply.

"I know where they grow in the greatest profusion. It is just a short distance back in the woods."

"Oh, but I promised my dolly I wouldn't go so far. If I go out of her sight she'll begin crying."

"But she'll be made happy again by the clovers. Just think how she will laugh when you bring her a dozen four-leafs!"

"And it's only a little way?" asked the Lamb.

"Just a few steps. It won't take but five minutes to go there."

"And are you the Rabbit?"

"Yes, of course."

"And you never eat Lambs?"

"Never."

"Then I guess I will go with you, but first——"

"Come right along. The sooner you get the clovers the sooner you will be back."

"Yes, I know, but first I will run and ask my dolly why rabbits have glaring eyes and horrid big fangs and sharp claws, and if she says——"

And the Lamb ran away to the flock and the Shepherd came down to the woods with his gun and caused a skidoo on the part of the Hungry Wolf. The Fox had been lying in ambush near by and had overheard the conversation, and when the Wolf had departed he said to himself:

MORAL.

"The Fool and the Innocent can take care of themselves; it is the wise guy that gets roped in."
