

POETRY.
THE REQUEST OF THE DYING BARD.
It was at Naples that Sir W. Scott first saw reason to despair, as to the genial influence of a southern sky—Court Journal.

Bear, bear me, to my home!
These weary feet would roam
No more through this land, pleasant tho' it be;
A yearning, wild desire,
Search'd my breast like fire,
For mine own dear Isle, o'er the deep, dark sea!

I may not linger here,
Tortur'd by hope and fear,
In chase of health, which I shall never find:
Then up! and I'll depart,
Since, sickness of the heart,
Hath seiz'd me, for all I'd things left behind!

A weary, wearing pain,
Pervades my breast and brain—
Where sleepless thoughts, perpetually fly:
Since, whilst life wanes, there are
In my sweet home, the light and airy
Those whom I yearn to see ere I die!

Bear, bear me home! warm, bright,
Fragrant with incense delight,
And glow, is this intellectual land,
Here, Rome's old heroes fought,
Here, sages wrote—saints wrought,
And here, were tried and train'd—Heaven's martyr band!

Here too, those rapt bards sung,
Whose charmed lyres so rung,
That the charm'd "Waverley" yet thrill'd with their
I am of those, they say, a tone;
Fond flatter! Away!
The land is fair, but oh! 'tis not mine own!

Here, have I worship'd; more,
Than on my stern home-shore;
But Fame is mock'd to the grieving breast;
Where'er I gaze, or range,
Scenes, visions, are strange,
And vainly I seek, and sigh for, rest!

Strange too, is this land's speech;
(None may my dream'd soul teach
Its myst'ry now) and hark, each long day
My low, wail, anxious ear,
Craves the sweet tones to hear
Of holy home! Would, that I were away!

Bear, bear me hence, to die—
I'm harrassing to lie
With kin below'd—not exil'd here—alone:
For, though this land be spread
With gardens of the Dead,
Perfumd, and sunny—'tis not mine own!

MISCELLANY.

[From the Comic Offering, for 1833.]

THE FIRE ESCAPE.

THE FLYBEKINS were distant connections of the great Lord B., living genteelly in the West of England; and Mr. and Mrs. Flybinks were the only adult members of the family at the period of their identical which gave rise to this anecdote. It happened once that these "country cousins" were possessed with an uncontrollable desire to enter within the hitherto unapproach'd circle of London fashion and gaiety, in which their noble relatives moved with such distinction. Every thing was propitious in furtherance of the meditated scheme. * * *

In all the pleasure to which they looked forward there was but one drawback, viz: a most extraordinary dread of London fires at night; and this originated in the frequent occurrence in their country paper, of paragraphs headed "Another alarming conflagration—many lives lost!"—put in either to aid the insurance office, or fill the paper. As our rustic pair had never visited the metropolis, they did not know but Leadenhall street, and Hyde Park, Lambeth and Portland Place, might all be close neighbors; therefore, however distant the different fires may be, they fancied they all occurred nearly in the same place; and from the time Mr. and Mrs. Flybinks resolved to visit town, scarcely a night passed in which they did not start in terror from their dreams, screaming "Fire! Fire!" All was hurry and preparation at the "Star and Garter" on the morning of the day, the "Baroness" was called on, and on the fourth day of their departure from Devonshire, they were duly set down at the White Horse Carriage; for road making had not then received the magic touch of Macadam.

The next day was occupied in searching for, and entering suitable lodgings; and the following day, having hired a carriage which their unpractised eyes considered most elegant in style and equipment, they sallied forth, armed with a card case, and a long list of commissions, the practiced horses going at the full rate of six miles an hour.

[They called on Lord and Lady B., who were gone out, and left their cards, and then proceeded to do their shopping.]

As the Flybinks drove along the streets, the words "Patent Fire Escapes," in large letters, upon the front of a tall house, attracted their attention, and aroused all their latent fears of London fires, with accounts of which the newspapers so frequently teemed. A fire escape was an important security to sleep, and might be taken down into the country. Accordingly check string was pulled, the manufacturer entered, the machines inspected, and an economical one selected by each; and in an hour after their arrival at home to dinner, the fire escapes were duly unrolled, and the front parlour windows, their evening meal being finished at the barbarous hour of nine, the Flybinks began to yawn over the events of the past day, and the prospective engagements of the morrow. The excitement of the morning in the crowded London streets had completely tired the rustic couple, who being susceptible of no further excitement, had sought repose at this early hour, and were both soon wrapped in deep sleep. Leaving them to enjoy their repose, we return to Grosvenor Square.

[Lord and Lady B. had returned.]

"Umph!" said the peer, "the Flybinks in town! what could have brought them up so far from the country?" "Something that will not detain them long, I hope," dryly answered Lady B.

"Yet you must take some notice of these country cousins," said the peer, "as I'll invite them to a family dinner." "Well, if we must," said the countess, shrugging her shoulders, and with that the subject dropped for the time. Now it is quite clear that however brilliantly might have been the prospects of the Flybinks, the peer and his lady wished them any where but in London. Their carriage was ordered at ten, to convey them to the Duchess of R.'s party, and Lord B. proposed making a friendly call on their relations before waiting on her Grace—Accordingly whether they drove, accompanied by two footmen, bearing flambeaux, the custom of the great in those days, when the city was not so well lighted as in the present age. The signs of this custom are indeed still to be seen in front of many mansions, which served for the footmen to extinguish their light. Meantime the Flybinks slept on, not dreaming of the honour intended them, and were as sound asleep as Duncan in Macbeth's castle, when a loud thundering rap at the door startled them amid their slumbers. The diminutive bandy footman that one home with the coachman and horses, the landlady and her family had followed the example of her lodgers; and before any one could rise to unbar the door, to ascertain the cause of such an unusual alarm, a second louder and longer rap was made upon it, and which awoke the sleepers to an inactive idea that the house was on fire, a notion confirmed by the strong glare of red light reflected against their windows, and illuminating the apartment, as the footmen impatiently shook thousands of sparks from their flambeaux. As a Bonaparte observed on another occasion, "From the sublime to the ridiculous is but one step," so it was with the Flybinks. From the most sublime repose they hurried into the ridiculous fire escapes, in the full conviction that the house was on fire; and without waiting to dress, or inquire into the real state of affairs, they gave the signal word "Now!" and both descended in all the freshness of their fears to the pavement before the door. The wondering lord and lady, and still more wondering footman, gazed upon the apparition before them with the most inexplicable amazement, totally at a loss to conceive the cause of such a novel reception.

The terrified pair were, like Othello, "perplexed in the extreme," when they found themselves, instead of being in the confusion of a fire, deposited beneath the windows of a magnificent carriage, attended by footmen with white torches and a full dressed lady and gentleman inquiring after them, and the meaning of the extraordinary descent. A few minutes served to explain the mal-a-propos mistake; the detected pair sought refuge in the hall of the house, with some such feelings as our first parents experienced when they felt the fatal apple in the garden of Eden. The carriage rolled away with the glittering coachman and footmen, and the ill suppressed mirth of their master and mistress, who quickly disseminated the story throughout the fashionable circle of the party, whether they were host, and which remained for the rest of the season a standing joke wherever Lord and Lady B. appeared. Humbled and confused the unhappy Flybinks could not retrieve the blunder they had committed, and prudently resigned all their ambitious schemes. So they returned to Devonshire with the unlucky fire-escapes, sincerely regretting they had even been tempted to purchase them. But, although the disaster had got wind, and with various versions had reached into Devonshire, they were much consoled by the following narrative of it, which appeared in the country press, and which most favorably to their interest and reputation, although totally devoid of truth in almost every particular. The flaming paragraph ran thus:—

"In this country, while upon a visit to their noble relatives, Lord and Lady B. in London, and Mrs. Flybinks escaped being burnt to death. The dooming element almost destroyed the lower part of the family mansion in Grosvenor-Square, over which the lady and gentleman slept, who had retired early to bed, and who, by the accidental return of Lord and Lady B. from a party, were awakened only just in time to effect their retreat by means of fire-escapes, fortunately attached to their bed-room window. We are informed that the fire occurred in consequence of the footmen appointed to sit up for their master and mistress having fallen asleep, leaving a lighted candle in the room. Mr. and Mrs. Flybinks escaped with the loss of all their clothing, but what they hurried on in the confusion, and were conveyed to a neighbouring hotel by their noble relatives, where they received succor for the night."

But unhappily for the Flybinks, the naked truth at length forced its way into Devonshire, and the true statement of the matter was circulated as above related, and now handed down to their posterity. Thus the best version of their story only placed them "out of the fire into the frying pan," and the unlucky fire-escapes merely saved them from the fear of being badly burnt, in order that they might all the rest of their lives be well roasted!
