POETRY.

[For the Courier.]

TO ——— ———.

(To be set to Music.)

I.

And are we then no longer what,
We were in other years?
And is the last pale look of love
Forever set in tears?
Then broken be the wild control;
But buried be each vow,
Dark in the thoughts of either soul—
Forever dark as now!

II.

Yet hath remembrance left no shade
Of earthly fault behind—
We cannot look upon the past,
And dream of aught unkind—
And, tho' some fancied spirit breathes
A coldness on the name,
The world may ever call us friends:
But never more the same!

III.

Should we ere meet by hill or dale
Where once we gaily rov'd,
Let not a hint of other years
Tell we have ever lov'd—
Cast not one lingering look behind—
The wound too deeply lies—
Let that which lives in either mind
Be all our sacrifice!

IV.

The light fades from the Minstrel's Harp—
The dream of youth is past—
Its sails are spread on Fortune's wave—
Obedient to the blast.—
The broken vows of other years
No future song shall tell—
Suffice to say we are no more
What we were once—farewell!

TIME AND HIS CHILDREN.

Time paused one day as he went his round,
For he felt an inward pain,
And he took his seat on a lofty ground,
With a melancholy strain;

"O that my daughter Truth so bright,
With falsehood could keep pace;
For I see he troubles the world outright,
And covers with woes its face."

And his heart beat high, as he turned around,
At the noise of footsteps nigh,
And he knew, as he heard the thundering sound,
It was Falsehood speeding by.

"Sire," cried Falsehood, "since we met,
I have busily been engaged;
I have made a breach in the kingdoms each,
And the world I left enraged.

"I met, just now, a poor old man,
And his locks were turning grey:
"No mercy," I cried, "for your guilt is dyed,
And cannot be washed away;"

"So the old man perished in despair,
Where he humbly kneeled to pray;
And then came up a maiden fair,
Whose lover was far away;

"I told her he lay by another's side;
And so she faded away;
But her lover returned, and found her not,
And he died yesterday."

Then the old man shook like a leaf, and wept
When he heard this tale of woe:
And he turned to Truth, and said, "Forsooth,
O daughter, what can we do?"

"O sire," she cried, "my eyes are dim
With my weeping night and day;
For Falsehood is strong, and he flies along,
Like a lightning's flash away.

"And he will not stop a moment for me,
But madly on he goes;
And wherever I go, it is ever so,
He has filled the world with woes."

And the old man wept again, like a child,
At what he heard her say;
Then he took his course on his fiery horse,
For he could not longer stay.

So time passed on in his eagle flight,
And Falsehood followed fast,
But Truth went slow, and her heart beat low,
To think how her lot was cast.

MISCELLANY.

THE CAPTURED INDIAMAN.

[We copy from Blackwood's Magazine, for April, the following narrative of the horrible atrocities said to have been perpetrated on board a West Indiaman which although under convoy, had been surprised and taken by the crew of a privateer schooner.]

A line-of-battle ship led—and two frigates and three sloops of our class were stationed at the outskirts of the fleet.

On this evening, (we had by this time progressed into the trades, and were within three hundred miles of Barbadoes,) the sun had set bright and clear, after a most beautiful day, and we were bowling along right before it: but there was no moon, and although the stars sparkled brilliantly, yet it was dark, and as we were the sternmost of the men of war, we had the task of whipping in the sluggards. It was my watch on deck. A gun from the Commodore, who showed a number of lights. "What is that, Mr. Kennedy?" said the captain to the old gunner. "The Commodore has made the night signal for the sternmost ships to make sail, and close, sir." We repeated the signal, and stood on, hailing the dullest of the merchantmen in the neighbourhood to make more sail, and firing a musket shot now and then over the most distant of them. By and by, we saw a large West Indiaman suddenly haul her wind, and stand across our bows.

"Forward, there," sung out Mr. Splinter, "stand by to fire a shot at that fellow from the boat gun if he does not bear up." "What can he be after? Serjeant Armstrong,"—to a marine, who was standing close by him in the waist—"get a musket and fire over him." It was done, and the ship immediately bore upon her course again; we now ranged alongside of him, on his larboard quarter.

"Ho, the ship ahoy!"—"Hillo!" was the reply. "Make more sail, Sir, and run into the body of the fleet, or I shall fire into you; why don't you, Sir, keep in the wake of the Commodore?" No answer.

"What meant you by hauling your wind just now, sir?"

"Yesh, yesh," at length responded a voice from the merchantman.

"Something's wrong, here," said Mr. Splinter—"Back your main topsail, sir, and hoist a light at the peak; I shall send a boat on board of you.—Boatswain's mate, pipe away the crew of the jolly boat." We also backed our main topsail, and were in the act of lowering down the boat, when the officer rattled out, "keep all fast with the boat; I can't comprehend that chap's manœuvres for the soul of me. He has not hove to." Once more we were within pistol shot of him. "Why don't you heave to, sir?"—All was silent.

Presently we could perceive a confusion and noise of struggling on board, and angry voices, as if trying to force their way up the hatchways from below: and a heavy thumping on deck, and a creaking of the blocks, and rattling of the cordage, while the main yard was first braced one way, and then another, as if two parties were striving for the mastery. At length a voice hailed distinctly. "We are captured by a ———" A sudden sharp cry, and a splash overboard, told of some fearful deed.

"We are taken by a privateer or pirate," sung out another voice. This was followed by a heavy crushing below, as when the spike of a butcher's axe is driven through a bullock's forehead deep into the brain.

By this time the captain was on deck, all hands had been called, and the word had been passed to clear away two of the foremost carronades on the starboard side, and to load them with grape.

"On board, there—get below, all of you of the English crew, as I shall fire with grape."

The hint was now taken. The ship at length came to the wind—we rounded too under her lee—and an armed boat, with Mr. Treenail, and myself, with sixteen men, with cutlasses, were sent on board.

We jumped on deck, and at the gangway, Mr. Treenail stumbled and fell over the dead body of a man, no doubt the one who had hailed last, with his scull cloven to his eyes, and a broken cutlass blade sticking in the gash. We were immediately accosted by the mate, who was lashed down to a ringbolt close by the bits, with his hands tied at the wrists by sharp cords, so tightly, that the blood was spouting from beneath his nails.

"We have been surprised by a privateer schooner, sir; the lieutenant of her, and twelve men are now in the cabin."

"Where are the rest of the crew?"

"All secured at the forecastle, except the second mate and boatswain, the man who hailed you just now; the last was knocked on the head, and the former was stabbed and thrown overboard."

By this time the lieutenant had descended to the cabin, followed by his people, while the merchant crew once more took charge of the ship, crowding sail into the body of the fleet.

I followed him close, pistol and cutlass in hand, and I shall never forget the scene that presented itself when I entered. The cabin was that of a vessel of 500 tons, elegantly fitted up; the pannels were filled with crimson cloth, and golden mouldings, with superb damask hangings before the stern windows and side berths, and brilliantly lighted up by two large swinging lamps hung from the deck above, which were reflected from and multiplied in, several plate glass mirrors in the pannels. In the recess, which in cold weather had been occupied by the stove, now stood a splendid cabinet piano forte, the silk corresponding with the crimson cloth of the pannels; it was open, a Leghorn bonnet with a green veil, a parasol, and two long white gloves, as if recently pulled off, lay on it; with the very mould of the hands in them.

The rudder case was particularly beautiful; it was a richly carved and gilded palm tree, the stern painted white, and intersected with golden fretwork, like the lozenges of a pine apple, while the leaves spread up and abroad on the roof.

The table was laid for supper, with cold meats, wine, and a profusion of silver things, all sparkling brightly, but it was in great disorder; wine spilt, and glasses broken, and dishes with meat upset, and knives, and forks, and spoons, scattered all about. She was evidently one of those London West Indiamen, on board of which there was much splendour and great comfort. But, alas! the hands of lawless violence had been there. The captain lay across the table, with his head hanging over the side of it next to us, and unable to help himself, with his hands tied behind his back, and a gag in his mouth; his face purple by the blood running into his head, and the white of his eyes turned up while his loud, stentorious breathing but too clearly indicated the rupture of a vessel on the brain.

He was a stout, portly man, and altho' we released him on the instant, and had him bled, and threw water on his face, and did all we could for him, he never spoke afterwards, and died in half an hour.

Four gentlemanly-looking men were sitting at table, lashed to their chairs, pale and trembling, while six of the most ruffian looking scoundrels I ever beheld, stood on the head of the table in a row fronting us, with the lights from the lamps shining full on them. Three of them were small, but very square mulattoes; one was a South American Indian with a square, highboned visage, and long, lank, black glossy hair of his cast. These four had no clothing besides their trowsers and stood with their arms folded, in all the calmness of desperate men, caught in the very act of some horrible atrocity which they knew shut out all hope of mercy. The two others were white Frenchmen, tall, bushy whiskered, sallow desperadoes, wonderful to relate, with, if I may so speak, the manners of gentlemen. One of them squinted, and had a hairlip, which gave him a horrible expression.—They were dressed in white trowsers and shirts, yellow silk sashes around their waists and a sort of blue uniform jackets, blue Gascon caps, with the peaks, from each of which descended a large bullion tassel, hanging down on the side of their heads.

The whole party who had apparently made up their minds that resistance was vain, for their pistols and cutlasses, some of them bloody, had all been laid on the table, with the buts and handles towards us, contrasting horribly with the glittering equipage of steel, and crystal and silver things, and on the snow-white damask table cloth. They were immediately seized and ironed, to which they submitted in silence. We next released the passengers, and were overpowered with thanks, one dancing, one crying, one laughing, and another praying. But merciful Heaven! what an object met our eyes! Drawing aside a curtain that concealed a sofa, fitted into a recess, there lay more dead than alive, a tall and most beautiful girl, her head resting on her left arm, her clothes dishevelled and torn, blood on her bosom, and foam on her mouth, with her long hair loose and dishevelled, and covering the upper part of her deadly pale face, through which her wild, sparkling black eyes, portruded from their sockets, glanced and glared with the fire of a maniac's, while her blue lips kept gibbering an incoherent prayer, one moment, and the next, imploring mercy, as if she had been still in the hands of those who knew not the name; and anon, a low, hysterical laugh made our very blood freeze in our bosom, which soon ended in a long, dismal yell, as she rolled off the couch upon the hard deck, and lay in a dead faint.

Alas the day! a maniac she was from that hour. She was the only daughter of the murdered captain of the ship, and never awoke in her unclouded reason, to the fearful consciousness of her own dishonor and her parent's death.

Hanging for a Livelihood.—A correspondent of an evening paper says, that there is a fellow going about the villages near London, who contrives to make a very profitable and easy livelihood by hanging himself. His method is, first, to select a tree by the road side, near the foot of which he strews a few pieces of paper which appear to be fragments of a letter addressed to his wife. He next suspends himself with a rotten cord, which, breaking, leaves him prostrate beneath it: in this situation he remains till some passenger notices his apparently awful condition. He then counterfeits returning animation so naturally, that the sympathy of the stranger is awakened; to whose enquiries he replies with a tale of distress, tells a long story of his wife and children, and says he is a reduced clerk on his way home. At Acton a deception of this kind was lately practised: the imposter succeeded in getting himself conveyed free to Birmingham with £7 or £8 in his pocket, subscribed by the humane gentry of the neighborhood.

Good Drinkers but Bad Payers.—Under this title, a spirit dealer in town has inserted, and placed in his window, a list of four of his customers who drink well, but forget to pay. Their designation, residence, description are all given, with hue and cry accuracy, and then it is added, "The above low characters like well to wat their wizen, but when you ask the lawin, they in general laugh at, or try to make a fool of you. By this intimation, I hope it will prevent them from imposing upon others, as they have done to me; and may all good people shun them as they would do the grizly bear, the notorious rattle snake, or the wonderful anaconda!" At the bottom of this anathema, there is a "turn over," and, on the opposite side of the paper, the following memorandum, indicative of the success of the experiment, is written:—"The three last mentioned individuals settled a few minutes after their names were exposed; the first made his arrangements to-day (Friday) to pay upon Saturday."—Paisley Advertiser.

ENIGMA.

I am a character well known in England, and there are few, either high or low, rich or poor, that are not acquainted with me. I shun cities and towns, and take up my abode towards the extremity of a village. I am a stranger to virtue and innocence; therefore with the fair sex I never appear. In respectable societies I am never admitted, but in a gang, among gypsies and beggars I am a principal character, and without me smuggling would be nothing. I never appear in the day time, but in the middle of night, and late in the evening, and always in disguise. I am fond of gaming, and always end in cheating, stealing, and plundering. It is the opinion of Burns and Blackstone that I should be put in jail, but I was certainly never there yet. From what I have said, you may suppose me to be some thief or pickpocket; but to prove that I am neither, I delight not in a crowd, and no sooner appear before one than it is gone.

It is well known that the provinces of Shense and Shanse contain some of the most opulent men in China. The natives say they have money heaped up like mountains. And the chief money lenders in Canton are from these provinces. During the last days of the late Emperor Keaking, a rich widow of the name of Chun, of the district of Tea-yuen-foo, had a son, who went to all lengths of luxury and extravagence. Among other idle pursuits he was a great chess-player. But chess on a piece of board or paper, as the Chinese have it, is a very meagre, though interesting game. Master Chun conceived a new idea. He got a large room painted as a chess-board, with tables for himself and friends on opposite sides. For chess men he purchased a set of beautiful female slaves, dressed them up in various colors, and made them perform, by a signal, the duty of knights, pawns, horses, kings, queens, castles, &c. This high chess-player saved himself the trouble of moving the pieces. At a given signal, the pieces taken made their exit at the door. Of these proceedings the Emperor got intelligence, and, probably, offended by a rich subject out-doing him in luxury, he affected to be horribly offended (his own habits gave the lie to this) at the idea of buying slaves to perform the office of chess-men! He fined Chun 3,000,000 of taels, and transported him to the black dragon river, telling him, at the same time, that he ought to be infinitely grateful, that his brain cup, (or head) was not separated from his shoulders.—Canton Register.

To those who, at this season, doze away the most delightful hours of the day, "o'er the heated surface of a feather bed," we commend the advice of the old dramatist Massinger

———"Rise before the sun,
Then make a breakfast on the morning dew,
Served up by nature on some grassy hill,
You'll find it nectar."

A winter morning's walk for health and exercise, may be enjoyed with satisfaction; but in the freshness and fragrance of the summer morning, a ramble through the fields imparts health and cheerfulness to the early riser, and tranquilizes his spirits for the day. In the appropriate language of exhortation, ye, who, "with eyes yet sealed by the heavy sleep of night," kill the brightest hours of life, get up early; then to the "vineyard, and see if the vine flourish and the tender grape appear," mark the progress of vegetation; observe the character and habitudes of animals trace the forest; it has more curious scenery than the town. The love of nature is a sweet and exhilarating passion. He who botanizes on the mountains or explores the latent root in the forest is a healthy and happy man. In the wood and in the field when the dews of the night sparkle like diamonds on the grass, and melt away before the rising sun, and when the feathered songster escaping from beds of moss, carol their matin hymn, the picturesque of nature charms more than the tapestry of the palace.

A short way to be Married.—A young couple went, not long since, into the study of a late Judge of our Supreme Court, who by virtue of a commission as Justice of the Peace was authorised to solemnise marriages, and desired him to marry them. "Very well," said his honor, whom they found writing, "pass me your certificate and you may go." The man handed a certificate that the bands had been published, but remained. The Judge continued his employment, until the impatient bride-groom again announced the intention of his visit. "Very well," said the Judge, and again pursued his task. After some further delay the neglected applicants once more reminded his honor of their desire to be married. "Why go home," said the magistrate; "you have been married this half hour." And it was true. The law only requires an acknowledgement of intention before a Justice of the Peace, and a recognization of that intention by the justice in his official capacity. There is no form of words necessary to the purpose, nor any ceremony, other than a simple declaration, which the Judge did not permit for a moment to disturb his meditation.—Georgia Examiner.

The Boston Transcript says—"Schr. Nile, at this port from Hallowell, has 100 bushels shoe-pegs." Will the editor stake his awl upon the truth of this? If it be a fact, it must be the sole and last cargo of this article the Bostonians will need at present.

At a militia training, which took place at Lehighton, Lehigh County, Pa., an affray arose between two of the parties assembled there, in the course of which one was stabbed to death. Immediately on his fall, one of his friends presented a loaded gun, which he had in his hands, and shot the other dead. Many were severely wounded. The cause of the dispute has not been made known.—[Was not it Rum?]

Capt. Stetson, of whale ship Enterprise, of Nantucket, at Rio Janeiro, has been condemned to nine years' confinement for having two negroes on board with the intent to sell them as slaves. The Nantucket Inquirer says that the negroes were taken into the vessel at the cape Verds at their own request, from motives of compassion, and with no design upon their liberty.
