POETRY.

TO THE GREAT PYRAMID.

Mountain of art! sublime, mysterious pile!
Eye of the desert! Desolation's throne!
Undeluged Ararat of Time! lone isle,
Left in the ocean of oblivion!

Marvel of marvels! Titan relic vast!
Gigantic gnomen of the boundless sand!
Link of eternities to come and past!
Stupendous vestige of a voiceless land!

What times—what deeds—what changes hast thou seen!
What throngs have gazed upon thy wondrous form!
Where are they now? Whole empires that have been
Young in thine eld, have banqueted the worm!

Kings, sages, conquerors—the god-styled race
Who once gave glory to Egyptia's name,
Mixed with the dust, may now perchance, deface
The very monument that told their fame.

Extending, at thy basement, far and wide,
Dwindling to nought where thou art nearest Heaven,
Thou art, in shape, the symbol of their pride,
Whose vastest thoughts to earth alone were given.

Fain would we learn the legend of thy birth;
Fain know why thus thou load'st the weary plain:
But, ponderous fabric! incubus of earth!
Thy stones are silent—our research is vain.

Thou hast no record: all hath pass'd away,
Save that by Time's sarcastic hand alone,
Scrawl'd on the dusty tablets of decay:—
"This was his work—the great, the proud unknown!"

UP, MEN OF ENGLAND!

[The following animated burst of patriotism and poetry, the effusion of one of Britain's host of Schills and Korners, was contemporary with that dark hour of suspense which followed the infatuated vote of the House of Peers against the Reform Bill, and when there were strong surmises that the King had forfeited his popular character of a Reformer. This happily was a mistake. The firm attitude taken by the people, perfectly overmastered the crisis: the poem remains as a warning which was meant as a call; and a glowing evidence of that noble and free spirit, open to conciliation, but which unwisely irritated by contemptuous denial of justice, still "Bides its time."]

Ye men of England, will ye see
The morn of freedom passing by,
Nor strike your blow for liberty?
Will ye—nor raise your shout on high?
Will only ye thus idly stand,
While Europe struggles for her right!
Arise, arise, with heart and hand,
Up, Men of England, to the fight!

O shame! less noble cheeks are pale,
That England's sons should crouch and kneel,
And faintly sue with coward wail,
Where meaner hands have grasped the steel.
Listen! your despot lordlings say,
Ye dare not struggle for your right,
Yet none that stirring taunt repay?
Up, Men of England, to the fight!

O! bitter shame, and bitter wo,
To bear so base a scorn so long!
Your firmer fathers paused not so,
When Hampden braved the Stuart's wrong.
And will ye fling their heritage
Of glory and of conquered right,
Before a factious bigot rage?
Up, Men of England, to the fight!

Ye strove with France in days of yore—
Once more she dares you to the field;
Not that your bravest blood should pour
Again a Bourbon's throne to shield:
With her she calls you to advance
On the broad path of truth and right,
What answer do you give to France?
Up, Men of England, to the fight!

France shows you what a people can
Against a tyrant's vassal horde;
France shows ye what there is in man,
When freedom flashes on his sword;
She points the way, she cheers ye on,
She bids you triumph for your right,
Dare ye not do what France has done?
Up, Men of England, to the fight!

What fear ye? no barbarian Czar
Can pour his Cossacks on your land:
No Prussian perfidy can mar
The triumph of your brother-band.
Ye are alone upon the seas,
Sole judges of your native right,—
One short, sharp hour your country frees;
Up, Men of England, to the fight!

And think ye Scotland will not lend,
In such a cause, her warrior tide?
Nor Wales her mountain-steep descend,
To share the peril at your side?
Nor Ireland sound her harp, and wave
Her pure green banner for your right—
A sister now, no more a slave?
Up, Men of England, to the fight!

By Liberty's eternal name,
Once England's proudest glory, arm!
Sweep from your isle oppression's shame,
And cleanse her of her locust swarm.
An honored grave that isle shall give
To every martyr of her right,
In life ye've died, in death ye live!
Up, Men of England, to the fight!

MISCELLANY.

[From the Dumfries Courier.]

INTERESTING NARRATIVE.—History of a Scottish emigrant, and beautiful trait of Indian character.—About twelve years ago, a person named M'Dougal, a native of Argyleshire, emigrated to Upper Canada. From anxiety to make the most of his scanty capital, or some other motive, he purchased a location where the price of land is merely nominal, in a country thinly peopled, and on the extreme verge of civilization. His first care was to construct and plant in the wild; and this task finished, he spent his whole time, early and late, in the garden and in the fields. By vigorous exertion and occasional assistance, he brought a few acres of ground under crop, acquired a stock of cattle, sheep, and hogs, made additional inroads on the glade and the forest, and, though his toils were hard, gradually and imperceptibly became, in a rough way, "well enough to live," as compared with the poverty he had abandoned at home. His greatest discomforts were, distance from his neighbors, the church, the market, and even the mill; and along with these, the suspension of those endearing charities and friendly offices which lend such a charm to social life.

On one occasion, M'Dougal had a melder of corn to grind, and, as the distance was considerable, and the roads none of the smoothest, this important part of his duty could only be performed by starting with the sun, and returning at its going down. In his absence, the care of the cattle devolved upon his wife, and as they did not return at the usual hour, the careful matron went in quest of them. Beyond its mere outskirts, the forest was to her terra incognita, in the most emphatic sense of the term, and with no compass of notched trees, it is not to be wondered at that she wandered long and wearily to very little purpose. Like Alps on Alps, tall trees arose on every side—a boundless continuity of shade; and fatigued with the search, she deemed it prudent to retrace her steps while it was yet time. But this resolution was much easier formed than executed; returning was as dangerous as 'going o'er,' and after wandering for hours, she sunk on the ground, her eyes swoln and filled with tears, and her mind agitated almost to distraction. But here she had not rested many minutes before she was startled by the sound of approaching footsteps, and anon an Indian hunter stood before her—"a stoic of the woods—a man without a tear." Mrs. M'Dougal knew that Indians lived at no great distance, but as she had never seen a member of the tribe, her first emotions were those of terror, quickening, it may be said, every pulse, and yet palsying every limb. The Indian's views were more comprehensive; constantly on the look out in search of the quarry, and accustomed to make circuits comprising the superfices of many a vast mountain and glen, he had observed without being observed himself; knew her home, recognized her person, comprehended her mishap, divined her errand, and immediately beckoned her to follow him. The unfortunate woman understood his signal, and obeyed it so far at terror left her power; and after a lengthy sweep, which added not a little to her previous fatigue, they arrived at the door of an Indian wigwam. Her conductor invited her to enter be signs; but this she sternly refused to do, dreading the consequences, and preferring death in the open air to the tender mercies of the cannibals within. Perceiving her reluctance, and scanning her feelings, the hospitable Indian darted into the wigwam and communed with his wife, who, in a few minutes, also appeared, and by certain signs and sympathies, known only to females, calmed the stranger's fears, and induced her to enter their lowly abode. Venison was instantly prepared for supper, and Mrs. M'Dougal though still alarmed at the novelty of her situation, found the viands delicious, and had rarely, if ever, partaken of so savory a meal. Aware that she was wearied, the Indians removed from a place near the roof, two beautiful deer-skins, and by stretching and fixing them across, divided the wigwam into two apartments. Mats were spread in both, and the stranger was given to understand that the farther domitory was expressly given to her accommodation. But here again her courage failed her, and to the most pressing entreaties she replied by signs, as well as she could, that she would prefer to sit and sleep by the fire. This determination seemed to puzzle the Indian and his squaw sadly; often they looked at one another, and conversed softly in their own language, and at last the red took the white woman by the hand, led her to her couch, and became her bedfellow. In the morning she awoke greatly refreshed, and anxious to depart without delay, but this the Indian would on no account permit. Breakfast was prepared; the Indian accompanied his guest, and conducted her to the very spot where the cattle were grazing. These he kindly drove from the wood, on the verge of which Mrs. M'Dougal descried her husband running about every where hallooing and seeking for her, in a state of absolute distraction. Great was his joy, and great his gratitude to her Indian benefactor, who was invited to the house, and treated to the best the larder afforded, and presented on his departure with a suit of clothes.

In about three days the Indian returned, and endeavored, by every wile, to induce Mr. M'Dougal to follow him into the forest. But this invitation the other positively declined, and the poor Indian went on his way obviously grieved and disappointed. But, again he returned and tho' words were wanting, renewed his entreaties, but still vainly and without effect, and then, as a last desperate effort, he hit upon an expedient, which none save an Indian hunter would have thought of. Mrs. Mc Dougal had a nursling only a few months old, a fact the Indian failed not to notice; after his pantomimic eloquence had been completely thrown away, he approached the cradle, seized the infant, and darted out of the door with the speed of an antelope. The alarmed parents instantly followed, supplicating and imprecating at the top of their voices; but the Indian's resolves were fixed as fate; and away he went, slow enough to encourage his pursuers, but still in the van by a good many paces, and far enough ahead to achieve the secret purpose he had formed, like the parent bird skimming the ground when she wished to wile the enemy from her nest. Again and again Mr. M'Dougal wished to continue the chase alone, but maternal anxiety baffl:d every remonstrance, and this anxiety was, if possible, increased, when she saw the painted savage enter the wood and steer, as she thought, his course towards his own cabin in the heart of the wild. The Indian, however, was in no hurry: occasionally he cast a glance behind, poised the child almost like a feather, treaded his way with admirable dexterity, and kept the swadding clothes so closely drawn around it that not even the winds of heaven were permitted to visit it too roughly. It is of course, needless to go into all the details of this singular journey, farther than to say, that the Indian at last called a halt on the margin of a very beautiful prairie, teeming with the richest vegetation, and extending to several thousand acres.—In a moment the child was restored to its parents, who wondering what so strange a proceeding could mean, stood for some minutes panting for breath, and eyeing one another in silent and speechless astonishment.

The Indian, on the other hand, appeared overjoyed at the success of his manœuvre, and never did a human being frisk about and gesticulate with greater animation. We have read or heard of a professor of signs, and supposing such a character were wanted, the selection could not, or at least should not, be a matter of difficulty, so long as even a remnant remains of the Aborigines of North America. All travellers agree in describing their gestures as highly dignified, eloquent and intelligent; and we have the authority of Mr. M'Dougal for saying, that the hero of the present strictly authentic tale, proved himself to be a perfect of the art.

The restoration of the child, the beauty and wide extent of the prairie, and various other circumstances combined, flashed across our countryman's mind, operating conviction where jealousy and distrust had lurked before, and as the Indian stood before him, his eyes beaming with benevolence and intelligence, his arms extended, and along with his body, thrown the most varied and speaking attitudes, he became more and more satisfied that his speech, if given in broken English would have run nearly as follows:—"You doubt Indian: you think him treacherous; you think him wish to steal the child. No, no: Indian has tribe and child of his own; Indian knew you long ago; knew you when you first came; and saw you when you not see Indian; saw you poor, but hard-working man; some white men bad, and hurt Indian; you not bad—hurt no one, but work hard for your wife and child; saw you choose bad place; Indian pity you; never make rich there; saw your cattle far in the forest—thought you come and satch them; you not come; your wife come; Indian find her faint and weary; Indian take her home—fear go in; think Indian kill and eat her; no, no, Indian lead her back; Indian meet you very sad; then very glad to see her; you kind to Indian, give him meat, drink, and better clothes than your own; Indian grateful—wish you to come here; not come; Indian very sorry; take the child, not run fast; know you would follow child. Look round! plenty of gronnd—rich, rich; Indian love the deer, and the birds and the beasts of the field, the chase make him strong; his father love the chase; look round, plenty ground—rich, rich;—many cattle feed here; trees not many on that side; make road in less than half moon; Indian help you, come, come, Indian your friend—come live here."

Mr. M'Dougal in a trice, examined the soil, and immediately saw the propriety of the advice given by the untutored, but by no means unintelligent or unobserving savage—if savage, in deference to custom, he must still be called. By a sort of tacit agreement, a day was fixed for the removement of the materials of our countryman's cabin, goods, and chattels; and the Indian, true to his word, brought a detachment of his tribe to assist in one of the most romantic "flitterings" that ever was undertaken either in the old or new world. In a few days a roomy log house was fashioned, and a garden formed in a convenient section of the beautiful prairie, from which the smoke was seen curling and a woodpecker tapping at no great distance. Mr. M'Dougal was greatly pleased with the change; and no wonder, seeing that he could almost boast of a body guard as bold as the bowmen of Robin Hood. His Indian friend speedily became a sort of foster brother, and his tribe as faithful as the most attached tale of gillies that ever surrounded a Highland chieftain. Even the stupid kine lowed on finding themselves transferred to a boundless range of the richest pasture, and up to the date of the last advices, were improving rapidly in condition, and increasing in numbers. The little garden was smiling like a rose in the desert; grass, over abundant, gradually giving away to thriving crops; and the kine so well satisfied with their gang that the herds and enclosures were alike unheeded to keep them from the corn. The Indian continued friendly and faithful, and occasionally bringing presents of venison and other game, and was uniformly rewarded from the store of a dairy overflowing with milk, butter, and cheese. Attached as the red man was to his own mode of life, he was induced at length to form part of the establishment in the capacity of grieve or head shepherd—a duty he undertook the more cheerfully, as it still left him opportunities of meeting and communing with his friends, and reconnoitering the altered denizens of the forest. Let us hope, therefore, that no untoward accident will occur to mar this beautiful picture of sylvan life; that the M'Dougal colony will wax stronger till every section of the prairie is forced to yield tribute to the spade and the plough, and that future generations of the clan will be able to say for themselves, and to impress upon their children,

"Happy the man, whose highest care
A few paternal acres bound;
Content to breathe his native air
On his own ground.

Whose herds with milk, whose fields with bread,
Whose flocks supply him with attire;
Whose trees in summer yield him shade,
In winter, fire.

Thus let me live, unseen, unknown,
Thus unlamented when I die;
Steal from the world, and not a stone
Tell where I lie.

A reformer, expressing his disappointment at the result of the decision on the house and window duty, said, with reference to the reform bill, the people had not gained by it what they expected. A wag who was present, replied, "They have got all they asked; they have got 'the bill—the whole bill—and nothing but the bill.'"

There is a report of Sir John Hobhouse going out as ambassador to Madrid. Should such be the case, the baronet will, notwithstanding his loss of office at home, continue to "touch the Spanish."

Lord Grey complains he cannot succeed in pleasing any party. He should follow the example of all duelists, and by going out he would certainly give satisfaction.

L. L. D.—When the allied Sovereigns visited Oxford in 1814, they were each dubbed L. L. D., and bore the infliction without any wincing. Old Blucher, indeed, who had to partake their honors, asked whether, since they had made him a Doctor, it would not be proper to make his Aid-de-camp, Baron Gneisenau, an Apothecary, that they might carry on business together; but it passed off as a pure and good joke, and nobody suspected the fact that "the drunken old hussar," as Napoleon called him, was ignorant that there were doctors of any thing but medicine.

A GENTLE HINT.—An uncle left in his will eleven silver spoons to his nephew, adding, "If I have not left him the dozen he knows the reason." The fact was, the nephew had some time before stolen it from his relative.

GAMBLER'S SYMPATHY.—Capt. G——, who had, as it is called, been 'cleaned out,' (another term for being robbed of his whole fortune,) not long since at the 'Northern Hell,' died lately of a broken heart, and in extreme poverty. So desperate indeed was his poverty, that the persons under whose care he expired, thought it advisable to apply to 'the club' for the means of burying him, but the answer was, 'they had done with him.'—English paper.

O DEATH! WHERE IS THY STING?—I saw a mourner standing at eventide over the grave of one dearest to him on earth. The memory of joys that were past came crowding upon his soul. "And is this," said he, all that remains of one so loved and so lovely? I call, but no voice answers. Oh my beloved one, wilt thou not hear? Oh, death! inexorable death! Let me lie down and forget my sorrows in the slumber of the grave." While he thought thus in agony, the gentle form of christianity came by. She bade him look upward, and to the eye of faith the heavens were disclosed.—He heard the song and transport of the great multitude which no man can number around the throne—here were the spirits of the just made perfect—there the spirit of her he mourned! There happiness was pure—permanent—perfect. The mourner then wiped the tears from his eyes, took courage, and thanked God.—"All the days of my appointed time," said he, "will I wait till my change come;" and he returned to the duties of life, no longer sorrowing as those who have no hope.
