POETRY.

[FOR THE COURIER.]

PREVALENCE OF DISCONTENT;
With three Suggestions for its cure.

If men have failings, no one can deny,
Unless he wilfully to truth is blind;
Since he in whom no faults we can descry
Must soar above the rest of human kind;
In fact he must be a divinity,
Which no one is on earth, howe'er inclined
To think himself so, or be thought by others:
In human frailty all mankind are brothers.

I therefore shall presume upon this fact,
All flesh is prone to err, whate'er his station;
And though some may contrive, by means of tact,
To keep his faults from public observation,
Yet 't would be very awkward to exact,
E'en from a saint, a strict investigation
Of all his private actions; not to mention
His thoughts, which some call actions in intention.

Some show their weakness by their Discontent,
Repining whilst endowed with ev'ry blessing;
Utt'ring complaints no kindness can prevent,
And every grateful sentiment repressing;
By which it really seems as though they meant
To make their God their debtor—while professing
To love their Maker—their own faults to scan:
Oh, what an inconsistent thing is Man!

This selfish feeling every rank pervades,
And ev'ry individual, in some measure;
In fact, there's not a person, but upbraids
His fortune at some time—when his displeasure
Is rous'd by aught—when ev'ry comfort fades
From his remembrance, and he fills his leisure
With evil longings for some good denied,
Which makes him spurn at ev'ry good beside.

Few perhaps have troubled to explore
The reason why mankind are so perverse;
What makes them always sigh for something more
Than what they have, and ready e'en to curse
Their Benefactor; chewing o'er and o'er
The cud of Discontent:—what can be worse,
Than thus his constant kindness to repay
With murm'rings and repinings ev'ry day?

A remedy, however, has been found,
To cure this evil; and by some applied
With great success:—'t is this—to look around
Upon the multitude on every side;
And you will soon perceive how you abound
In blessings that to thousands are denied,
While such survey your Discontent decreases
And ev'ry murm'ring inclination ceases.

Now even this may not prove satisfactory
To some whose souls are filled with vast desires:
Some may be found whose minds are so refractory,
That e'en this survey cannot quench the fires
Which burn within them:—but my muse didactory* [quires.
Shall teach them what their wayward mind requires.
Reflection—that "the time must shortly come,
When six short feet of earth shall be your home."

But that this remedy may be complete
Without a lack of any one ingredient;
That I may mix the useful with the sweet,
Which, Horace says, by all means is expedient;
Look constantly towards that calm retreat,
That Heavenly goal to which 'mortales redeunt;'
And while on heavenly joys your mind is bent,
'Twill find no room for worldly Discontent.

THETA.

* Didactic is common place, and would not suit my rhyme.

GOOD NIGHT.—By Mrs. Hemans.

Day is past!
Stars have set their watch at last,
Founts that thro' the deep woods flow
Make sweet sounds, unheard till now,
Flowers have shut with fading light—
Good night!

Go to rest!
Sleep sit dove-like on thy breast!
If within that secret cell
One dark form of memory dwell,
Be it mantled from thy sight—
Good night!

Joy be thine!
Kind looks o'er thy slumbers shine!
Go, and in the spirit land
Meet thy home's long parted band,
Be their eyes all love and light—
Good night!

Peace to all!
Dreams of Heaven on mourners fall!
Exile! o'er thy couch may gleams
Pass from thine own mountain streams!
Bard! away to worlds more bright—
Good night!

MISCELLANY.

The future Destiny of the World.
From the French of M. de Chateaubriand, translated in the Literary Gazette.

Europe is hastening to democracy.—What is France, but a republic, fettered by a Director? Nations have out-grown their swaddling clothes; they have attained their majority, and pretend that they have no longer need of guardians. From the time of David down to our days, Kings have been at the head of affairs—it seems now to be the turn of the people. The short exceptions of the Greeks, Carthagenians, and Roman Republics, do not change the general fact of the political state of antiquity, viz. that monarchy was the established condition of society all over the globe: now, all societies abandon monarchy, or at least monarchy such as we have hitherto known it.

The symptoms of the social transformation abound. In vain do we attempt to reconstitute a party for the absolute government of one man; the elementary principles of this government are not to be found; men have changed as well as principles. Though facts sometimes appear to oppose each other, they nevertheless concur towards the same result, like the wheels of a machine, which, turning in opposite direction, produced a common action.

Sovereigns, by gradually submitting to necessary liberties, by detaching themselves without violence, and without shock, from their pedestal, might transmit to their descendants, for a longer or shorter period, their hereditary sceptre, reduced to proportions measured by the laws. France would have more calmly ensured her happiness and her independence, by keeping a child who could not have made of the days of July a shameful deception; but nobody understood the event. Kings persist in keeping what they cannot retain: instead of descending gently by an inclined plane, they expose themselves to the danger of falling into the abyss; monarchy, instead of dying a glorious death full of honour and years, runs the risk of being flayed alive—a melancholy mausoleum at Venice contains only the skin of an illustrious general. The countries least prepared for liberal institutions, such as Spain and Portugal, are impelled to constitutional movements. In these countries, ideas outstrip men. France and England, like two mighty battering-rams, shake, by their reiterated blows, the crumbling ramparts of ancient society. The boldest doctrines on property, equality and liberty, are proclaimed morning and evening in the face of monarchs, who tremble behind a triple line of unsuspected soldiers. The deluge of democracy is gaining upon them—they ascend from story to story—from the ground floor to the roof of their palaces, whence they will cast themselves into the waves that will swallow them up.

The discovery of printing has changed the conditions of society; the press, a machine which cannot now be broken, will continue to destroy the ancient world, till it has formed a new one. Printing is the creating word of all powers; the word (la parole) created the universe; unhappily the word (le Verbe) in man partakes of human infirmity; it will mingle evil with good till our fallen nature shall have recovered its original purity.

Thus the transformation brought on by the age of the world will take place; every thing is calculated on this plan; nothing is now possible but the natural death of society, as at present constituted, which must lead to its regeneration. It is impiety to contend with the angel of God, to fancy we shall arrest the designs of Providence. Beheld from this elevated point of view, the French revolution is but a small part of the general revolution; all impatience ceases, all the maxims of ancient policy become inapplicable. Louis Phillippe has brought the democratic fruit nearer by half a century to its maturity. The stratum of civism in which Philipism has planted itself, being less exhausted by the revolution than the military and popular strata, still furnishes some sap for the vegetation of the Government of the 7th August, but it will soon be exhausted. * * * * * *

But, after all, it must go. What are three, four, six, ten, twenty years in the career of a people? The former state of society perished with the Christian policy from which it issued. At Rome the government of man was substituted for that of the laws by Cæsar; they passed from the republic to the empire. The revolution now proceeds in a contrary direction; the power of the law takes the place of that of man; we pass from royalty to republicanism. The era of the people has returned; it remains to be seen how it will be filled up. * * * *

What will the new (state of) society be? I cannot tell: its laws are unknown to me: I do not comprehend it any more than the ancients could comprehend the state of society without slaves, produced by Christianity. How will fortunes be brought to a level? how will wages be adjusted to labour? how will woman attain to complete emancipation? I know not. Hitherto society has proceeded by aggregation and by families: what aspect will it bear, when it shall be merely individual, as it is tending to become, as we see it already form itself in the United States?—Probably the human race will grow greater, but it is feared that man will grow less—that eminent genius will be lost—that imagination, poetry, the arts, will expire in the cells of a society like a bee-hive, in which each individual will be but a bee—a wheel in a machine—an atom in organized matter. If the Christian religion were to be extinguished, the world would come through liberty to that social petrifaction which China has attained through slavery.

Modern society has taken ten centuries to compose itself: it is now discomposing itself. The generation of the middle ages were vigorous, because they were in the ascending progression. We are weak, because we are in the descending progression. This waning world will not recover its strength till it shall have reached the lowest degree, when it will begin to reascend to a new life. I see, indeed, a population which proclaims its power, which cries 'I will! the future is mine! I discover the universe? those who came before me saw nothing! the world was waiting for me! I am incomparable! my forefathers were children and idiots!'

Have the facts corresponded with these magnificent words? What hopes have been deceived, with respect both to talents and to characters! If you except about thirty men of real merit, what a herd have we of libertine, abortive generations, without convictions, without political or religious faith, scrambling for money and places, like beggars for a distribution of alms—a flock which owns no shepherd, which runs from the plain to the mountain, from the mountain to the plain, disdaining the experience of the old herdsmen, inured to the wind and rain.—We are but transitory, intermediate generations, devoted to oblivion—forming the chain to reach the hands which will reap the harvest of futurity.

"Care killed a Cat."—(Old Proverb.)—How many vex themselves about ills, that may never occur; and if doomed to take place, no human foresight or care could prevent.—What a mockery and self-delusion is this!—In all such emergencies, let things take their course; and time, the great expounder of mysteries, will do more, in dispelling the phantom (if it prove to be one,) than all human prudence or forethought could master.

Filial account of One's Father's attraction's.—Though my father was neither young, being forty-two; nor handsome, having lost an eye; nor sober, for he spent all he could get in liquor; nor clear, for his trade was oily; nor without shackles, for he had five children; yet women of various descriptions courted his smiles, and were much inclined to pull caps for him.—Hutton's Autibiography.

The Barrel Organ Nuisance.—We overheard the following conversation a few days ago, between two barrel-organists. 'I say, Bill, ow is it as you always gets so much more nor me, ven your horgin is'nt worth so much as mine by five shillin', and you plays nothink but old Robin Gray, and Duke o' York's March, and God Save the King, and the Undred-and-Fourth Psalm, and sich like, while I flares up with the Unters' Chorus, and 'Ome sweet 'Ome, and Cherry Ripe and Bonnets o' blue, and lots o' good uns?"—"Vy, I'll tell you ow it be—you see ven I goes to ire a horgin, I gets von as bad out o' chune, as I can, vile you does nothink but luk hout for a good un. So ven you goes to a ouse and gives 'em a turn o' your hinstriment, nobody takes no notice on you, but ven I begin to flare up with mine, the gemman opens the vindy, and chucks me sixpence to go away—and no mistake.

Definition of Love.—At a parochial examination, a minister asked a sort of half-crazy woman what love was, which the string of the former question led him to: "What's love Nanny?" "Love, Sir?" Yes, what's love?" "Hoot fye, Sir," says Nanny, "dinna spier sic a daft like question as that, when I'm sure, ye ken that love's just an unco' fykeiness I the mind, an' what mair can me or any ither body say about it?"

Curran.—Curran both feared and hated big dogs. As one of the grounds of his hatred, he once told with infinite humour an adventure of his with a mastiff. When a boy he had heard somebody say, that any person, by throwing the skirts of his coat over his head, stooping low, and creeping along backwards, might put the fiercest dog to flight. He accordingly resolved to make the attempt with a miller's dog who would never let the boys rob his orchard; but soon found, to his sorrow, that he had a dog to deal with who did not care which end a boy put foremost, if he could get a good bite out of him. "I pursued the instruction," said Curran, "and as I had no eyes but in front, fancied that the mastiff was in full retreat. But I was confoundly mistaken, for, at the very moment I thought myself victorious, the enemy attacked me in the rear, and having got a reasonable mouthful out of it, was fully prepared to take another before I was rescued. Actually, for a time I thought that the beast had devoured my whole centre of gravity; and that I should never go upon a perpendicular again."
