

POETRY.

From the Saint Andrews Standard.

TO WOMAN.—BY SOLYMAN BROWN.

Fond creature of feeling! the world is thine own,
Thy glory and riches—thy beauty and pride.
Were nothing to thee must be used them alone.
With no sweet companion to smile at thy side.
The sun in his glory would roll on unheeded,
The moon would revolve in her orbit unseen;
No star would afford him the light that he needed,
No flower would be lovely, no field would be green.

Fair creature of fancy! the future and past,
No less than the present possess thy control;
Man's hopes would be hopeless, his memory's a'cast,
And joy undelighting expire in his soul.

If thou wert unseen in the visions before him,
Or lost to remembrance in years that have flown,
From darkness so starless no light could restore him,
But the light of the love-torch for ever thine own.

Sweet creature of smiles! there are beams in thine eye
That light up the soul to a lovelier morn,
Than ever Aurora has blushed o'er the sky,
To gladden the traveller faint and forlorn.

Misfortune is fortune if thou wilt care it,
And sorrow is joy in the light of thy smile;
His life is a blessing if Woman will bless it,
For Man has no sadness she cannot beguile.

Bright creature of beauty! no flower is so fair,
As that which has freshen'd its bloom on thy cheek,
No fragrance so cheering is borne on the air,
As accents of fondness by woman express'd.

The soul that receives thee expands with emotion,
Unknown in the whispers of fancy before;
Less cheering the mid-summer breeze of the ocean,
When gathered at eve on the sea-beaten shore.

THE WAKING CHILD'S HYMN.

From the French of M. de Lamartine.

Father, to whom my sire directs his prayer,
Whose name we name not but on bended knees;
Dreadful yet kind art thou, the only fair,
My mother looks when'er thy name she sees.

'Tis said the beautiful and radiant sun
Is but a plaything of thy mighty power;
Thou dost bid him rise and bid him run,
Red like the lamp that burns at midnight hour.

'Tis said the little birds that sport in air,
Or on the trees, are warm'd and hatch'd by thee,
And little children, too, beneath thy care,
Are taught to know thee, and to bend the knee.

To taste thy gifts all creatures learn thy call,
All are invited to the general feast;
At thy large table there is room for all—
The smallest insect is a welcome guest.

The feeble lambkin creeps the fragrant thyme,
Which thou bestow'st so freely day by day;
At noon, at eve, at morn! 'I'll seek thy name,
And name thy name, O Father, when I pray!

Then since he hears us from his distant throne,
And knows our wants, and all our wishes true;
I'll ask for other blessings than my own,
What others want I'll ever keep in view.

MISCELLANY.

SINGULAR STORY.

CAPTURE OF A PRIGATE.

The late Lord Exmouth, then Capt. Pellew, struck, in the Nymph, the first naval blow of the war, and captured the Cleopatra, a French frigate of superior force, after a splendid action. This might be deemed a key to all the victories which ensued; and it was loudly hailed by the nation as an omen of success. A singular story is told of it. "An active and most anxious pursuit of the enemy for the last three weeks had made the crew not less eager than their commander; and the subject of the expected battle engrossed their sleeping and waking thoughts. A dream of Capt. Israel Pellew had, perhaps, some influence on the result; and not less extraordinary was that of a master's mate, Mr. Pearce, who had served in the Winchelsea. He dreamed that the Nymph fell in with French frigates the day after leaving port; that they killed her captain and took her; and so vivid was the impression, that he firmly believed it to be a supernatural intimation, and spoke of it accordingly to his messmates. They rallied him immoderately on his superstition; but his confidence remained unshaken; and when his papers were examined after his death—for he was killed in the action—it was found that he had written the dream in his pocket-book. The enemy's frigate (it is related in a brief memoir of his brother Israel in the appendix) was seen at a very early hour, but his brother would not allow him to be called until the ships were on the point of meeting. Meeting him as he ran on deck half dressed, he said to him with emotion, "Israel, you have no business here, and I am very sorry I brought you from your home." We are too many of us," Israel, whose whole attention was occupied with the enemy, exclaimed, "That's the very frigate I've been dreaming of all night! I dreamt I shot away her wheel." "No! shall have her in a quarter of an hour!" But his brother, who had already inferred her high state of discipline from her manoeuvres, replied, "We shall not take her so easily—see how she is handled." There was nothing extraordinary in this dream so naturally prompted by his waking thoughts; for it was known that some French frigates were cruising in the channel, and the most probable course to intercept them had been discussed by the brothers on the previous evening. It led to its own accomplishment. He took charge of the after main-deck guns, and made the enemy's wheel the constant object of his fire. His aim was so true—for he was an excellent practical gunner—that after four men had been killed successively at the wheel, he at length disabled it. Other anecdotes are worthy of extract—"The crew fought with a steadiness and gallantry above all praise. A lad, who had served in the Winchelsea, as barber's boy, was made second captain of one of the main-deck guns. The captain being killed, he succeeded to command the gun; and, through the rest of the action, Captain Pellew heard him from the gangway give the word for all the successive steps of loading and pointing, as if they had been only in exercise. In the heat of the action, one of the men came from the main deck to ask the captain what he must do, for that all the men at his gun were killed or wounded but himself, and he had been trying to fight it alone, but could not. Another, who had joined but the day before, was found seated on a gun-carriage, complaining that he had been very well as long as he had been fighting, but that his sickness had returned as soon as the battle was over, and that he did not know what was the matter with his leg, it smarted so much. It was found that the poor fellow had received a musket ball in it."
