

POETRY.
THE CAST-AWAY SHIP.
BY JOHN MACCOLM.
Her mighty sails the breezes swell,
And fast she leaves the leeward land,
And from the shore the last farewell
Is waved by many a snowy hand;
And weeping eyes are on the main
Until the verge she vanishes away—
But from that hour of parting pain
Oh! she was never heard of more!
When on her wide and trackless path
Of desolation, doom'd to lie,
Saw, sank she mid the bleeding wreath
Of cracking cloud and rolling sea?
Or—where the land but rocks the eye—
Went drifting on a fatal shore?
Vain guesses all! Her destiny
Is dark! She ne'er was heard of more!
The moon had twice changed her form
From glowing orb to crescent wan,
Mid seas of calm and scowl of storm,
Since from her port that ship had gone;
But ocean keeps its secret well,
And though we know that all is o'er,
No eye hath seen—no tongue can tell
Her fate: she ne'er was heard of more!
Oh! there were tales of sorrow known,
"Twas something to the broken heart;
The pang of doubt would then be gone,
And fancy's endless dreams depart!
It may not be—there is no ray
By which her doom may explore;
We only know—she sailed away,
And ne'er was seen nor heard of more!

MISCELLANY.
(From Death's Doings.)

THE BALL.

A STORY FOR FASHIONABLE MOTHERS.

"Even if I were not prevented by this unlooked-for engagement from accompanying you to the ball to-night, my love," said the Honourable Alfred Seymour to his beautiful young wife, "you must nevertheless have declined it, for the child is evidently unwell; look how the pulses throb in his little throat, Sophia!" "So they always do, I believe, I really wish you were less of a cranker and a coddler, my dear; however, to make you easy, I will send for Davis immediately: as to the ball, as I am expected, and have gone to the trouble and expense of a new dress, and have not been out such a long time, long time—really I think I ought to go."

"You would not leave my boy, Lady Sophia, if?" "Not if there is the least danger, certainly; nor if the doctor should pronounce it ill; but I do not believe it is so—nothing particular about the child, for my part."

As the young mother said this, she cast her eyes on the child, and saw in his little heavy eyes something which she felt assured was striking—she saw, moreover, more strikingly than ever, the likeness it bore to a justly beloved husband, and in a tone of self-correction added, "Poor little fellow, I do think you are not quite the thing; and should it prove so, mamma will not leave you for the world."

The countenance of the father brightened, and he departed, assured that the claims of nature would soon triumph over any little lingering love of dissipation struggling for accustomed indulgence; and as he bade her good bye, he did not wonder that a star so brilliant desired to exhibit its rays in the hemisphere alluded to, which was one in the highest circle of fashion. Nevertheless, as he could not be present himself, he thought it on the whole better that she should be absent. A young nobleman, who had been his rival, and whose willow some time after their marriage, had lately paid marked attention to a young beauty, every way likely to console him; and Mr. Seymour thought it would be a great pity if his lady, whom he had not seen for some months, should, by appearing before him in the full blaze of beauty, (unaccompanied by that person whose appearance would instantly recall the sense of her engagement,) indispose his heart for that happy connection to which he had shown this predilection.

Unfortunately the fond husband gave indication of his admiration alike in his looks and words; and as the fair young mother turned from him to her mirror, she felt for a moment displeased that her liege lord should be less solicitous than herself to "watch the world" with her beauty; and whilst in this humour, she called her maid to show her the turban and dress "in which she intended to appear."

"Lark, my lady! why sure you intend it yet—did ever any body hear of such a thing as going for to stay at home when you are all prepared? Why you've been out of sight ever so long, because you were not fit to be seen, as one may say; but now that you are more beautiful than ever, by the same rule you should go ten times as much—Do, pray—my lady, begin directly: Miss Somerville may look twice over she catches my lord, if so be he sees you in this blue plume; cold brooch is soon warm they say."

Could it be that this vulgar nonsense—the senseless tirade of low flattery and thoughtless simulation to error—should affect the mind of the high-born and highly educated Lady Sophia?—Alas! yes, a slight spark will ignite vanity, and the love of momentary triumph suppress the more generous wish of giving happiness to others in a sphere distinct from our own.

The new dress was tried on; its effects were extolled by the maid, and admitted by the lady, who remembered to have read or heard of some beauty, whose charms were always more striking when she first appeared after a temporary confinement. The carriage was announced, and she was actually descending, when the low wail of the baby broke on her ear, and she recollected that in the confusion of her mind during the time devoted to dress and anticipated triumph, she had forgotten to send for the medical friend of the family.

Angry with herself, in the first moment of repentance, she determined to remain at home, but unfortunately reconsidered, and went before the arrival of the doctor; 'tis true she left messages and various orders, but so far fulfilled a mother's duties, and she yet closed her eyes to the evident weakness of her boy, and contented herself with determining to return as soon as it was possible.

But who could return while they found themselves the admired of all, and when at least the adoration of eyes saluted her from him whom she well knew it was cruelly to attract? The observation forced upon her of Miss Somerville's melancholy looks told her this, and compelled her to recollect that she was without her husband, and therefore, critically situated; and she proved, that in the midst of triumph we may be humbled—in the midst of pleasure be pained; and she resolved to fly from the scene of gaiety more quickly than she had come.

But numerous delays arose, each of which harassed her spirits not less than she regarded her movements, and she became at length so annoyed as to lose all her bloom, and bear herself now as much consoled with on her looks as she had a few hours before been congratulated. She felt ill, and was aware that she might be ill, and had a right to expect reproaches from her husband, not less on account of herself than her child; and whilst in this state of perplexity, she was summoned to her carriage by her servants, who, in the confusion occasioned by messengers from home, as well as from herself, had increased her distress.

The young mother arrived to see the face of her dying child distorted by convulsions, and to meet from her husband angers, reproaches, and contempt. She was astonished, even terrified by witnessing the death of the innocent being which she had forsaken in a moment so critical; and bitter was the sorrow and remorse which arose from offending him who had hitherto loved her so fondly, and esteemed her so highly. These emotions, combining with other causes, rendered her soon the inhabitant of a sickbed, and converted a house, so lately the abode of happiness and hope, into a scene of sorrow, anxiety and death.

Lady Sophia, after much suffering, recovered her health; but when she left her chamber, she became sensible, though through pity and kindness, that to her situation, esteem and confidence were withdrawn. She had no child to divert the melancholy of her solitary hours; and what was of more consequence, no husband who could console with her on his loss. Silence of the past was the utmost act of tenderness to which Mr. Seymour could bring himself on this subject, which returned to him with renewed pain when his anxiety was removed for the life of one still dear, though no longer invaluable.

All this misery, the fearful prospect of a long life embittered by self-reproach, useless regret and lost affection, was purchased by a new dress and an ignorant waiting maid—a risk so full of danger, and so fatal in effect, was incurred, to strike a man already refused, and wound a woman who never injured her. Such are the despicable efforts of vanity for temporary distinction, and the deplorable consequences of quitting the tender offices of affection, and transgressing the requisitions of duty.

SUMMARY.

GREAT-BRITAIN.
There was considerable disorder in the Commons on the 21st, when Mr. Forrester and Mr. John O'Connell used the words "indictment" and "not the fact," in the Tithes debate. The former apologized, and the latter did so also, after having brought back to the House by his brother Maurice; but the Speaker spoke often, and complained that the House was degenerating in its manners.

The voluntary enlistment Seamen's bill, has passed a committee of the Lords without amendment.
Our Edinburgh correspondent of the 19th speaks of discussions in the Kirk. The General Assembly has ordered a Fast Day for the 29th instant, which is the day of the Dalkeith Fair. A great body of the people will attend market as usual, and not obey the Assembly.

Campbell, the poet, has returned to London, after his long residence in Algeria, which he has spent in exploring that interesting country, where he has collected ample materials relating to its early literature, and the manners and habits of its ancient and modern people. It is probable Mr. Campbell will hereafter embody the result of his researches for the benefit of his countrymen.

Mr. Green's Balloon Ascent.—On Monday, Mr. Green completed his 200th aerial voyage, by ascending from the Surrey Zoological Gardens, it being also the anniversary of his first ascent in the year 1821, at the Coronation of George the Fourth. Notwithstanding the various vicissitudes he has met with in these excursions by air and sea, the voyage of yesterday was without a parallel, he having remained in the balloon one hour and three quarters, and only reached the distance of Greenwich Park, when he descended at a quarter past 8 o'clock. He describes the ascent as one of the finest and most magnificent he ever made; on leaving the earth the balloon rose to the height of about 3,000 feet, when not finding any current to carry him in an horizontal direction, he passed through the clouds, and the intense heat of the sun's rays acting on the balloon, caused it to rise with the rapidity of a rocket. After an absence of half an hour he again passed through the clouds and became visible to the metropolis, as he described, exactly over the same spot he had left; having in vain tried to find a current to cross the river, he descended in a favourable part of Greenwich Park, amidst a dense crowd of people, from whom he had some difficulty in extricating himself and the balloon, who in their desire to render him assistance, were wrapping him in the numerous folds of the silk.

THE ARMY.—The Morning Chronicle asserts that the Duke of Cumberland is the person of the "highest rank" alluded to by Mr. Hume, in the House of Commons last night, as being, if Mr. Hume's information was correct, liable to impeachment for high crimes and misdemeanors against the State. The Duke is Grand Master of the Orange-men; and the Chronicle states that "it was a prevalent rumour in the House, that several original warrants for lodges in the various regiments, signed by the Royal Grand Master, have been produced in Committee." If it shall appear that Orange Clubs really exist to a great extent in the Army, it will be an additional reason for disbanding a large portion of it, and remodelling the remainder. It is not consistent with public safety that the Army should continue in its present state. That it is fearfully demoralized, the records of our Police-Officers prove; but if it is also under a secret party and political organization there can be no question as to the method of dealing with it which Parliament should adopt.

It was asserted, on the authority of letters from Germany, that the Northern governments were preparing to acknowledge Don Carlos as King of Spain, and that Count Alarid, the agent of the latter at Vienna, had almost daily intercourse with Prince Metternich to settle the terms, it was supposed that the defeat of Don Carlos in his attempt to get possession of Bilbao, would operate unfavorably for his interests abroad.

The Bourdeaux Election announces the failure of two large commercial houses in that place.

A new species of wheat which grows and ripens in seventy days, is said to have been introduced with success into the Department du Nord.

UNITED STATES.
CHOLERA.—The Buffalo Board of Health state, that from the 13th to the 27th August, there had been 41 deaths of Cholera, within the limits of that city.
At Bloomsburg, Penn. seven persons died of the cholera within ten days, and many more were dangerously sick.

MORE LYNCHING.—Almost every mail brings intelligence of outrages committed upon persons suspected of tampering with slaves.—The Louisiana Advertiser of August 18, says:—We learn from a passenger who arrived here yesterday morning from Madisonville, that two persons had been detected in distributing seditious pamphlets among the slaves, in the neighborhood of St. Helena. They were immediately tried by the citizens, and the charges being fully proved, they were sentenced to be hung forthwith! The Louisiana Journal, published at St. Francisville, August 18, says:—On Friday evening last, a guard of citizens brought to this place from the parish of St. Helena, three men, one of whom was John Glascock, against whom five warrants had issued from this parish, for riots and breaches of the peace. A man and a woman, charged with them, and the judge's sign manual is yet plainly to be read on each of them. What benefit will our country derive from such odious proceedings!—Boston Courier.

Travelling.—Eighty years since the mail between Boston and Philadelphia was carried in 21 days. New mail is received from that place in less than 36 hours.
