POETRY.

(From Chambers' Edinburgh Journal.)

MY ISLAND HOME.

My Island Home! I love thee well,
Despite the rugged shore;
Thy rocks of gladsome moments tell,
Fled to return no more.
They speak of joys' unclouded light—
Of sorrows, scarce less dear;
Of laughing moments' rapid flight—
Affliction's balmy tear.

My Island Home! I love thee well,
Despite thy barren plains:
They'll tell of early hours of bliss,
While memory remains.
'Tis true they also speak of grief;
Yet not for aught below
Would I forego those dreams of youth,
Though early tinged by woe.

My Island Home! I love thee well,
Despite thy cloudy skies;
In thy calm twilight's clear obscure
What varied thoughts arise!
Even thy wild storms possess a charm;
Thy ocean's circling foam
To Thule's child can bring no dread—
They speak of peace and home.

My Island Home! my childhood's home!
Beyond far fairer lands,
'Tis thou, despite thine aspect wild,
That all my love demands:
The visions of the loved and lost
Are blended with each scene;
And memory lives to linger o'er
Each spot where bliss hath been.

MISCELLANY.

Divine Providence.—God preserves his works conformably to the same wisdom with which they were created.—Astronomors have, for many ages, been observing the annual motion of the elliptic, and never have they seen the sun so much as a single second short of, or beyond the tropics. The sun neither moves in the circle of the equator, which would set the earth on fire, nor in the meridian, which would produce an inundation of water; but his course is traced in the elliptic, describing a spiral line between the two poles of the world. In this harmonious course, he dispenses cold and heat, dryness and humidity, and derives from these powers, each of them destructive by itself, latitudes so varied, and so temperate, all over the globe, that an infinite number of creatures of an extreme delicacy, find in them every degree of temperature adapted to the nature of their existence. —St. Pierre.

It is now Morning—Still and glassy lies the lake, within its green and dew sprent shores. Light mist hangs around, like a skiey veil, and only reveals the uncertain outlines of woods and hills. The warm vernal air is just stirring in the valleys, but has not yet ruffled the water's mirror. Turn the eye upward—the misty vault opens into the calm, clear heavens, over which there seems suffused a genial spirit's breath. Far distant on the horizon, flash out the gilded and rendenning peaks; and from yonder crown of snow, a sudden radiance announces the rising sun. Now in the east, stream the golden rays through the soft blue vapor. The breeze freshens, and comes loaded with fragrance from the woods. A faint dark curl sweeps over the water; the mist rolls up, lifts itself above the meadow and hill, and in gathered folds hangs light around the mountains. Away on the level lake, till it meets the sky, silvery gleams the sheeted wave sprinkled with changeful stars, as the ever rising breeze breaks in its ripples. Now the pennon that hung loose around the mast rises and fitfully floats. We spread the sail, and casting off from the shore, glide out with cheerful hearts on our voyage; before us widens the lake; rock after rock receding on either hand, and opening between; still bays, hung round with sparkling woods, or leading through green meadows invite us to blue sunny hills.

It is now Noon.—In the middle lake speeds the bark over light glancing waves. Dark opens down the clear depth. White toss the crests of foam—and as the sail stoops to the steady wind, swift flies the parted water round the prow, and rushing pours behind the stern. The distant shords glow bright in the sun, that alone in the heaven looks unveiled with vivifying goodness over the earth. How high and broad swells the sky! The agitated lake tosses like a wide field of snowy blossoms. Sweep after sweep of the long retiring shores—hill gleaming over hill, up to the shadowy mountains—and over these Alpine needles, shooting pearly white into the boundless azure—all lie still and happy under the ever smiling sun.

And now it is Evening.—The sun is sinking behind the dark mountains, and clouds scattered far in the east float soft in the rosy light. The sun is now hidden, and strong and wide sweeps its golden flame like the holy flame of a funeral pile. The breeze slackens—the waves subside in slumber—and slowly the bark steers into its sheltering bay. Long shadows stretch from hill to valley; fall like dark curtains on the lake—and a solemn, subdued serenity broods like a protecting spirit, over the hushed and quiet earth. Only the far summits yet retain their brightness. Faint blushes stain the eternal snows, recalling the first dawning roses, like the memory of early joys, in the tranquil moments of departing age. These, too, fade; but the evening star looks bright from the blue infinite, and, like the herald of a better world, leads us softly to our haven.—J. G. Percival.

Military Anecdote.—The following anecdote connected with the battle of Orthes, relative to Lieutenant Macpherson, whose heroism at Badajoz we have already recorded will not be uninteresting.—He was still a Lieutenant at the period of the battle of Orthes, attached to the light Company of the 45th foot. Just before the attack commenced, the regiment was drawn up in line, partly hidden by a kind of hedge or bank. The bugles had sounded the recall, and the light troops were hastening back to form in the rear. As the files opened to let them through, some of the enemy's tirailleurs had followed them nearly up to the line, which made Macpherson anxious to see the whole of the men fall in before he himself retired. The skirmishing was still kept up as they fell back, and an occasional man fell on both sides, as these expert shots rapidly loaded as they moved, and then with deadly accuracy turned to stop the advance of their enemy. The gallant Macpherson, in his anxiety to do his duty, was left almost the last, when he was about to effect his own retreat; but just at this moment he perceived one of the enemy's sharpshooters, raising his piece to take a deliberate aim at him. This man had ventured thus far alone; for his comrades, having come within range of the fire from the line, had commenced retiring. Colonel Macpherson's own description of his reflections are at the same time amusing and painful.

I saw the man, he observed, taking a deliberate aim at me. What to do I did not know. I could not get at him before he could fire; while to run would have been equally useless—I should then be shot in the back; for I knew that he was one of those picked men who never missed any thing; in fact, I could think of nothing else to do, but to stand fire. The fellow was a confounded long time taking his aim, as if determined to make sure of his mark; so I put myself in an attitude, by presenting my right side to him, putting my arm straight down to cover me, and screwing myself up as small as possible; but I can assure you I felt smaller than I looked, as I thus stood like a target to be shot at by a fellow that could hit any one of my buttons that he pleased. At last, bang went his piece, and I felt in a moment he was right. I did not fall, but staggered a few paces backwards, and then felt very much inclined to reach my soldiers, some of whom had seen the whole affair without being able to lend any assistance. My right arm was rendered unserviceable, and I felt confident that the ball had entered my body; but I was uncertain whether or not it had found its way out. I staggered towards the line, but must have fallen, had not a brave fellow, named Kelly, (an Irishman, and one of our crack shots,) seeing that I was hit, run forward to support me. As soon as I felt his friendly grip round my body, I mustered fresh strength, although bleeding profusely, both inside and out.

Kelly commenced a dialogue, observing, "by my sowl, sir, you're badly wounded, sure." I felt very faint, but replied, "Yes, Kelly, I think so; feel if the ball is out." Kelly watched its course, and then placing his hand upon my loins where it should have made its exit, exclaimed, "No, by my sowl, then it isn't, and you're spaking yet. But where's the man that did it?" Without, at the moment, any feeling of revenge towards him whom I then thought my destroyer, I pointed in the direction from whence he had fired, and there, on the very same spot, stood this daring fellow, deliberately re-loading, to have another shot at my assistant or to finish me. But Kelly quitted his hold of me for a moment, and I saw his unerring gun raised to his shoulder. The French soldier was unmoved. Kelly fired, and he fell dead. The Colonel, in relating this incident, spoke with much regret of the fate of his gallant enemy.—Robinson's Life of General Picton.

A gallant Brigand.—The mail to Ferrara was forced to have an escort of 20 men; when travelling this road last week, the diligence was attacked, and all the passengers were obliged to dismount and render up their goods and chattels. Not one piece of finery, not one piece of merchandize did the thieves spare; they even despoiled the ladies of their ear-rings, and it is said, with a very gentle hand; for in Italy, even the brigands have a certain politeness of manner, and rob you in a gentlemanly style. One girl sat apart from the rest, she did not join in the clamour of her companions for mercy and forbearance, but she wept bitterly. The chief approached her, and, in answer to his interrogatories, she said, "It is for my mother's picture I shed these tears; I have left her,—perhaps never to see her again, and you have taken her picture from me." The robber moved at her artless distress, promised to return her treasure for a kiss, which, says our narrator, she right joyfully and heartily bestowed; so heartily, that the chief, not to be outdone in generosity, returned to her all her property.

Singular effect of Jealousy.—A few days ago several houses were totally consumed by fire, at Sommaing, near Cambray, in the North of France, through the vengeance of a jealous wife. The spouse of a worthy weaver of Cambrics, having become suspicious of the fidelity of her husband, determined to put an end to his wanderings by involving him and herself in one common destruction. With this intention, she set fire to a quantity of straw in the garret of their dwelling, and then went down to the cellar and turned the key upon the poor weaver, who was busily employed at his loom. He was soon afterwards alarmed by cries of fire, but finding the door fastened, he called to his wife to open it; she, however, remained industriously turning her spinning-wheel, and replied, "No, no! broil, broil, you gay deceiver? We will both be broiled together!" The weaver, however, succeeded in bursting open the door, and escaped with his tender wife, just as the roof was about to fall in upon them, and broil them to a cinder. The woman is said to be out of her mind.

"Light Ho! Light! light!" exclaimed an unfortunate gentleman, the other night, in Nassau-street, from the midst of a pile of rubbish, against which he had broken his shins for want of a light. "Who are you, that wants a light?" responded a voice near him. "Who am I," said the gentleman from the rubbish, among which he lay groaning; "I'm a poor unfortunate who has got east away here among the breakers, for want of a light to steer by. Who the d—l are you, if I may be so bold?" "I'm the lamplighter in this here district; and if you call it dark to-night, you must be crazy." "Not dark, do you say? why, you scoundrel, it's as dark as Egypt, and there isn't a lamp burning." "A lamp! no, of course not. We never lights lamps when there's a moon." "We! who do you call we?" "Why, I and the Corporation, to be sure. We knows better than to waste ile when there's a moon." "Where is the moon? I see none." "Nor I nother,—but there's a moon somewhere." "So there's a sun somewhere. But's on the other side of the earth." "It aint so with the moon though. She's in this here hemisphere; or ought to be, any how, for the almanac says so." "But of what use is she, if she don't show herself."—"Why, that's her look out, not mine." "She don't look out at all, I tell you, nor can't. Don't you see the sky is covered over with thick clouds?" "Well that aint none of my bread and butter. I and the Corporation never takes cognizance of no clouds, no how. We has our standing rule, and that is, never to light a single lamp when there's a moon, shine or no shine. And so good bye to ye."—N. Y. Transcript.

A foolish Custom reproved.—Sir Gilbert Heathcote being one night in company with the minister, Sir Robert Walpole, at his house, and being asked what he would like for supper, made free to mention beefstakes and oyster sauce.—After supper an hour or two was spent in conversation over a glass of good wine: at last Sir Gilbert rose to bid his friend good night; but in passing into the hall he found it lined with the liveried attendants of the minister, to whom he now turned and asked, 'Pray, Sir Robert, be so good as to point out which of these I am to pay for my beef-steak?' Sir Robert taking the hint, gave the signal for the servants to withdraw immediately.

How to please your friends —Go to India—stay there twenty years—work hard—get money—save it—come home—bring with you a load of wealth, and a diseased liver—visit your friends—make a will—provide for them all—then die: what a prudent, generous, kind-hearted soul you will be!
