POETRY.

THE LADY BUG AND THE ANT.

By Mrs. Sigourney.

The lady bug sat in the rose's heart,
And smiled with pride and scorn,
As she saw a plain dressed ant go by,
With a heavy grain of corn—
So she drew the curtains of damask around,
And adjusted her silken vest,
Making her glass of a drop of dew,
That lay in the rose's breast.

Then she laughed so loud that the ant looked up,
And seeing her haughty face,
Took no more notice, but travelled on
At the same industrious pace.
But a sudden blast of Autumn came,
And rudely swept the ground,
And down the rose with the lady bug bent,
And scattered its leaves around.

Then the houseless lady was much amazed,
For she knew not where to go,
And hoarse November's early blast
Had brought with it rain and snow:
Her wings were chilled and her feet were cold,
And she wish'd for the ant's warm cell,
And what she did in the wintry storm,
I'm sure I cannot tell.

But the careful ant was in her nest,
With her little ones by her side,
She taught them all like herself to toil,
Nor mind the sneer of pride:
I thought, as I sat at the close of day,
Eating my bread and milk,
It was wiser to work and improve my time,
Than to be idle and dress in silk.

CASE OF MADAME LAFFARGE.

The trial of Madame Laffarge, for the murder of her husband, by administering poison to him at several times, which has recently taken place at Tulle, in France, has excited an unusual degree of interest, and we have therefore extracted from a late paper a detail of the circumstances of the case as reported before the trial; but whether they were fully supported, we are not aware. The Court, it seems, pronounced her guilty of murdering her husband, with extenuating circumstances, and sentenced her to hard labour for life, and exposure in the pillory. The trial has produced great excitement, as well on account of the extraordinary nature of the charge, as of the beauty of the accused, and the rank and noble character of the parties concerned.

Charles Pouch Laffarge inhabited Glandier.—He possessed a considerable real property, and worked an iron mine. He belonged to an honorable family, was possessed of excellent qualities, and was beloved by all who enjoyed his acquaintance. He had the misfortune to lose his first wife. Being still a young man, he wished to form a new alliance, and to increase his capital by a fortune with a wife. This idea induced him to visit Paris in August, 1839, where he applied to a M. Fay, negociator of marriages, who proposed to him to marry Miss Mary Capelle.

Mary Capelle, scarcely twenty-four years of age, belonged to a highly respectable family, and had received a distinguished education. She had been an orphan for many years, and this calamity added to the interests which her beauty and her talents inspired. So many apparent advantages determined M. Laffarge to propose for her. Mary Capelle's relatives made the necessary inquiries concerning M. Laffarge and the marriage was celebrated in a few days after she arrived at Glandier, a most unexpected and afflicting scene took place. She shut herself in her bedchamber and wrote a most extraordinary letter to her husband, in which she disgraced herself, and revealed to her husband all the bad passions with which she was agitated. She demands of her husband to save her from herself, or that she will become an adulteress. She wishes to fly and go to Smyrna. She speaks of suicide by poison: such are the sentiments conveyed in this letter. Thus vanished the hopes of happiness of an unfortunate family. What was to be done? Some friends were consulted, who advised the husband to endeavour to bring his wife to a better state of feeling by kindness and affection. This course was adopted, and the wife appeared to have conceived a sincere regard for her husband.

This sudden change created some surprise, and excited doubts of her sincerity, but M. Laffarge did not wish to doubt her; he already began to take pleasure in explaining to her his plans for the future; he disclosed to her that he had made an important discovery in the manufactory of iron, which he expected would produce enormous profits. Mary Capelle was much occupied with this discovery; she had doubts at first of its value, as she expressed in a letter, but she was afterwards convinced of the importance of this new process. She mentioned in a letter, that it did not require much outlay to establish it, and that the profits would be enormous. During this time her affection for her husband appeared to increase; she encouraged her husband to go to Paris to take out a patent for his invention, and to raise some money to carry it into effect. Some days before his departure Mary Capelle was afflicted with violent spasms, which gave her husband an opportunity of proving his affection for her. She then declared that she was indebted to her husband for her recovery, and said she would in return make a will in his favour.

M. Laffarge, determined to give her a similar proof of his affection for her, handed her his will, by which he bequeathed all his property to her at his death. Mary Capelle sent this instrument to M. Legris, a notary at Soissons. The fact took place on the 28th of October, 1839.

From this moment she meditated the death of her husband, by which event she would succeed to his property. During M. Laffarge's stay in Paris the most tender correspondence was continued between them. Every day letters passed between them expressive of the greatest affection. This correspondence continued until the middle of the month of December. At this period it became certain that M. Laffarge would obtain the patent so anxiously expected, and Mary Capelle considered the moment had arrived to accomplish her design.

On the 12th of December she sent for arsenic to a druggist at Uzerche, under pretence of poisoning rats, which were troublesome. At the same time she expressed a desire to send her portrait to her husband, and some cakes made at Glandier. She wished that those cakes should be made by M. Laffarge's mother who indulged this whim. The cakes were made, and when baked were left in Mary Capelle's bedchamber. The latter then prepared a box, in which she placed her portrait, a watch, shoes, music, and chestnuts; and in a separate box some of the cakes prepared by her mother-in-law. She constantly affirmed that she sent four of those cakes, but the examination of witnesses proved that she likewise sent another cake of a different size and description.

The box was sent by the stage coach to Paris, and it is remarkable that Mary Capelle requested her mother-in-law to write a note stating that those cakes were made with her own hands.

The letter in which Mary Capelle informed her husband that she had forwarded her portrait and the cakes had not been found, but two letters written by Laffarge are in existence, in which proofs exist that she strongly recommended a delicious cake.

From these letters it results that she recommended her husband to eat this delicious cake at midnight of the 18th, and that she would eat a similar one on the same day and same hour at Glandier, so that she would be united to him in thought by the accomplishment of a fact common to both.

On the 18th instant Laffarge went to the coach office and received the box, which he took to his lodgings. By a fortunate chance M. Laffarge did not open the box himself, but employed his servant, who has been examined, and has described accurately the articles contained in the box, and has declared that there was but one cake, and if there had been more he should have seen them. This declaration is in complete contradiction of the assertion of Mary Capelle, that she only sent the cakes made by her mother-in-law. This witness added that Laffarge broke a piece of the cake and eat it, saying it was his wife who sent it. Immediately afterwards, on the night of the 18th, Laffarge was attacked with vomiting, which confined him to his bed on the following day. The date of his indisposition is proved by the books of the hotel where he lodged, and by the remedies which were furnished to him on the 19th. On his death-bed, and during his agony, this unfortunate man related to his physician the fact of the cake having been sent to him, and his subsequent illness.

Whilst these extraordinary facts were passing in Paris Mary Capelle was expressing singular apprehensions at Glandier. A letter from her husband having mentioned that he suffered from a headache, this news appeared to cause her serious uneasiness, and she expressed a determination to go to Paris to attend her husband. She expressed an apprehension that she should receive a letter sealed with black, and contrary to her custom, went to meet the postman to see whether her apprehension would be realised.

Laffarge though blessed with a robust constitution, was not quite recovered when he obtained his patent, and returned to Glandier on the 3d of January, 1840. Mary Capelle received her husband with the strongest marks of affection. She left her bed to come to meet him. Laffarge was invited by his wife to eat some cold turkey, but he had no sooner partaken of it than he was attacked with cholic and vomiting, which never afterwards entirely ceased.

Mary Capelle always showed marks of impatience when any person but herself wished to attend her husband, and had a violent dispute on the subject with his mother, in presence of his physician. In the meantime Laffarge's sickness made alarming progress—he felt a painful burning in his throat—he was tormented with violent cholics, and a complete interruption of the circulation of the blood proved that his end was approaching.

During this time Mary Capelle was continually procuring more poison, under pretence of destroying rats. On the 5th of January, after the return of her husband, she obtained some arsenic by means of a note appended to a physicians' prescription. At the same period she sent for some arsenic to a druggist at Uzerche, who refused to deliver it. At a later period she employed one of the workmen to procure her some arsenic at Brives. This man after keeping it for some days, being pressed by her, gave it to her on the 10th January. It was always under pretence of destroying rats that she procured this arsenic, and one day she told her husband that she had sufficient to kill an army of rats. On the 11th of January, the day after that on which the workman handed her the arsenic, several circumstances combined to create suspicion in the family of Laffarge. In the morning, whilst she was still in bed, Mary Capelle asked for some milk whey, which was prepared by her sister-in-law, Madame Bassiere, and she drank it. Laffarge likewise expressed a wish to have some, which his sister prepared, and brought into her brother's room, who was at the moment asleep. Mary Capelle then sent her waiting maid for the whey, and a Mademoiselle Brun, who was in bed in the same room, saw Mary Capelle throw some white powder into the whey and mix it with her finger. Mademoiselle Brun asked her what she had mixed in the whey, and she answered orange flowers. Mademoiselle Brun not being satisfied with this answer, repeated the question. Mary Capelle affected not to hear her, and made no reply. The whey was then brought to Laffarge who refused to take it, and it was placed on the mantle-piece.

Madam Bassiere having thrown the greater part into the fire, a white powder remained at the bottom, which created no attention till Mademoiselle Brun mentioned what she had seen in the morning. This was told to M. Laffarge, who ordered what remained to be taken to the chymist at Uzerch, who examined it and discovered arsenic, but merely said that M. Laffarge ought to be careful from whom he received any drink. At a later period the residue of this whey was analyzed by some physicians and chymists, who discovered arsenic in it. It happened on the 11th of January; on the same day another drink was prepared for Laffarge, composed of some wine diluted with water, sugar, and some bread. Mary Capelle was alone in her husband's room with Mademoiselle Brun, who was employed near the fire-place.—This person saw her take the glass which contained the drink and bring it to a press, and she heard the noise of a spoon against a vessel which she supposed was in the press. It appeared to her that Mary Capelle had mixed something in the drink prepared for her husband. Having done this, she handed the drink to her husband. Laffarge having drunk it, cried out, "Mary what have you given me? It is burning me!" "That is not surprising," said Mary Capelle to Mademoiselle Brun, "he has an inflammation, and they give him wine."

Mademoiselle Brun went near the press, and observed traces of a white powder, and perceived a pot containing a similar powder. This powder has been examined by physicians, who declared that it was arsenic. She asked Mary Capelle what this powder was, who replied that it was gum; the other replied that gum would dissolve. Mary Capelle replied that she would drink out of this glass, which she did, after pouring a quantity of water into it. The following night Mary Capelle was attacked with cholic and vomiting.

At another time Laffarge's mother perceived Mary Capelle mixing a white powder in a drink for her husband, when she did not think she was perceived. Her mother in law asked her what she mixed in the drink, she replied gum, and that she frequently did so, and at the same time she wiped the spoon carefully.

It was not only in the drink that she mixed the arsenic, but with an inconceivable audacity, she rubbed more on some flannel, which was used for friction—this flannel was examined by chymists, and was proved to contain arsenic.

Thus the unfortunate Laffarge perished, the victim of a horrible crime in presence of his mother, sister, and physicians, who were stupified with the symptoms, and still could not suspect a person so intimately connected with the victim.

On the 13th of January, Dr. Lespinas was called in, but there were then no hopes of saving Laffarge. The physician had no hesitation in declaring that Laffarge was expiring the victim of poison.

The following is an extract from an English paper:

"The very deepest sensation has been produced in France by the result of the trial at Tulle. Madame Laffarge continued in a state of lethargy throughout Saturday, but on Sunday morning revived, and appeared to resume all her energy.—She said the contest between her and her enemies was not yet over, and she would still make herself heard. She was sustained by her sense of freedom from guilt; her innocence would sustain her, and her only hope was that she might live long enough to prove it. M. Raspail, who was summoned immediatly after M. Orfila gave his evidence did not arrive till twelve o'clock on Saturday night when all was over; we understand that his carriage broke down twice on the road. He intends, he says, to publish a memorial, and declared that he would undertake to produce from the hangings of the court, two old fauteuils, and some worn out chairs, more arsenic than was found in the body of M. Laffarge. He has been admitted to examine the arsenical spots on the porcelaine sauce rs obtained by M. Orfila, and has declared his confident opinion that they result from the nitrate of potass employed by that chymist, and not from the body of M. Laffarge."

A letter from Tulle, dated Saturday morning, half past nine o'clock, received by estafette, says, "The registrar went to the gaol, at half-past eleven last night, to read to Madame Laffarge the judgment rendered by the Court, but we are assured that she was totally incapable of hearing it. She is in an alarming condition. The nervous affection to which she has constantly been a prey has become aggravated by other symptoms, as hypertrophia, phthis, &c., to such a degree that her death may be expected very shortly. Her counsel are preparing to appeal to the Court of Cassation, and it is believed that it may be well grounded on some irregularities in the proceedings. The requisitory of the Advocate-General, and the judgment of the Court, were made known to her this morning."
