...ss than ...ot purchased ...id not last. And ...prevent the purchase of ...cases? That shipowners did ...for cheap ships was proved by ...on the books at Lloyd's at this period ...were registered more first-class vessels than ... Then as to wages. The Americans paid ...gher wages than we did, and built ships on a more expensive scale; yet we beat them in the commerce of the world, and America was in fact the country from which we had most to fear—(hear)—possessing as she did capital, enterprise, and energy—(hear). In short it was the dear country, not the cheap country, from which we had most to fear; therefore the bugbear of cheapness might be dismissed at once—(hear, hear). * *

If the shipowner's monopoly were destroyed, it would not be fair, for instance, to compel him to man his ships with three-fourths British seamen. The removal of these restrictions was required equally by justice and by policy. The justice seemed self-evident; and, as to the policy, it should be recollected that, unless these restrictions were removed, the ship-owner would have no inducement to register his ship as a British vessel—(hear, hear). Then, again, take the case of a seaman; he had a monopoly against the foreigner, but he was exposed, on the other hand, to the effects arising from the regulation requiring a certain number of apprentices to be taken in every ship, and was also subject to the tax for the Merchant Seamen's Fund, which only afforded a pittance, one-fourth of that furnished in the workhouse to the pauper—(hear, hear). From these restrictions, certainly, the seaman and ship owner should be relieved. With respect to the ship-builder, he laboured under none of any importance. All his materials were procurable at the cheapest possible rate, and there was only duty of 15s. per load on such small portion of Baltic timber as he employed, this main material being the British oak, which was nowhere nearer nor cheaper than in this country. But even assuming the timber duty to be of any importance, it could be easily compensated by a drawback being allowed, as suggested by Mr. Huskisson. * * * *

A great deal had been said about competition, but he did not see why the shipowners should be fearful on that account: they lay under no greater disadvantages than were common to all the trades in England—such as paying higher wages than foreign countries. That, however, had no more application to shipowners than to any other trade. Those disadvantages had not prevented the other trades from placing themselves at the head of all other nations; and why should the ship-owner, with the unparalleled cheapness of capital, the enormous trade, and the ready markets of England, fear the foreigner? and why should we not be confident that our character—and character it must be remembered, bore a pecuniary value—(cheers)—our geographical position, so remarkably placed between the intercourse of the two hemispheres—our established trades' connections, and, above all, the maritime genius of the people—that characteristic which made every Englishman feel himself at home upon the wave, and the whole world his home—would not enable us to meet and to over-come any competition?—(loud cheers). The expressions of fear which they heard from shipowners were, no doubt, natural, but utterly groundless; but he was not prepared to say it would not be wise to adhere to the course parliament had always shown a disposition to adopt, and do something to break the force of the transition from protection to freedom—(hear). But with regard to the main principle of the exchange, let them not hesitate; let them adopt it freely, honestly, boldly, let them trust to the principle, and it would work out its own result—(ironical cries of hear). If we now gave our sanction to the freedom of navigation he hoped and believed that our example would have a powerful effect upon foreign countries. They had its first fruits already, in America and Prussia—(hear, hear). And when England and America concurred in setting this example to the world, other nations would find it difficult to hold out against it; they would be drawn by the moral force of that example into the same course—(cheers). We should then see the ocean one great highway of nations, as free to the ships which it bore upon its bosom as to the winds which swept them to their various destinations; and England would have the glory of having achieved another triumph, and made another contribution to the general prosperity of the world—(great cheering). * * Anxious as they all were, however, to extend the field of employment as much as possible for the British shipowner, he thought the measure should extend to our coasting trade,—because taking the case of America as most important, it was not likely that America or any other foreign country would have much concern with our coasting trade, whereas the coasting trade of America would be to us and our colonies of great importance; and it was proposed to relinquish our colonial trade, which was of immense importance to America—(hear, hear). It was most important that we should have access to the coasting trade of America.

Mr. Hawes: If we can get it—(hear, hear, and a laugh).

Mr. Gladstone understood that Mr. Bancroft had ...ed all to those who yielded all, and "all" in...d the coasting trade. Practically, it would ...idle and an empty question as far as regard-...

The Rev. Mr. Kenyon having apologised for his speech at Templederry, has been reinstated in his parish.

True bills have been found by the Grand Jury of the Central Criminal Court, London, against the Chartist leaders. Their trial will take place at the July sessions.

MASSACRE OF THREE MISSIONARIES.—The Sydney papers of the 31st of January, received by the last Mail announce the murder of three English missionaries, at the island of St. Christoral, by the natives, in the month of September last, and the bodies were afterwards cut up and devoured by the savages. The English attendants on them contrived to effect their escape, and had reached New Granada in the ship Anonyme, which brought the news to Sydney.

FRANCE.

The Presse states that the Commission on the Constitution has decided on the following important points:—"The political constitution of France shall be a democratic Republic, one and indivisible. This proposition was adopted unanimously. The project of the constitution is to be preceded by a declaration, admitting, besides the rights already enjoyed by the people, those of gratuitous education, employment, and assistance. The question on the legislative powers gave rise to several long discussions. It was at length determined that there should be but one legislative chamber, composed of 750 members. In case, however, of a revision of the constitution, the Assembly should remain as at present composed of 900 members. The elections to be made by department and ballot. The Executive Government to be confided to a President appointed by direct universal suffrage, by communes, for four years without a possible re-election. Two millions of votes, at least, to be necessary for nomination of the president. The commission has not yet adopted any resolution as to the duties of the President and of the Ministers." The Journal des Debats differs from the Presse in its account of the resolutions of the Committee on the Constitution. The Debats states that re-election to the Presidency may take place, but an interval of at least four years from the period when the previous incumbency shall have terminated. The President to be responsible.

The committee of Public Works was occupied on Wednesday in examining an amendment proposed to be introduced into the decree authorizing the Government to purchase the railroads. The Committee adopted the following resolutions:—

"1. That all the railroads shall be purchased, and become the property of the State.

"2. That a proposal shall be made to purchase them by means of Government securities.

"3. The companies being redeemed shall be dissolved by law, and each shareholder shall be invited individually to accept or to refuse the offers made by the Government.

"4. The shareholders who shall refuse to accept the offers of Government shall be bound to submit their demand to the verdict of a jury. The discussion was then adjourned to Thursday."

The Minister of Public Works informed the Assembly on Wednesday that the National Workshops had undergone a transformation. All agitation had ceased; there were now neither threats nor complaints. The law against riotous assemblages passed on Wednesday, in a single sitting of the National Assembly, by a majority of 478 to 82.

A Great Debt.—The Rev. Alexander King, of Dublin, in his discourse at the old South Church, Boston, last Sunday afternoon, in urging his hearers to give for the benefit of Catholic Ireland, took occasion to say that they ought to do so on the ground of justice, the church of which he was now
