POETRY.

HOME.

(From the Louisville Journal.)

The world is all before me,
To choose where'er I will;
The blue sky bending o'er me,
Lights valley, plain, and hill!
O, many a nook enchanted,
In virgin beauty drest—
With Eden freshness haunted,
Is wooing in the west.

And many a fount is flowing,
With none to hear its tale,
And only wild flowers showing
Its pathway in the vale.
And many a boundless prairie,
Like some remembered scene
In boyhood's dream of fairy,
Where man has rarely been.

And many a sunny highland,
Is gleaming far away,
And many a spicy island,
Where summer loves to stay;
And strange bright birds are courting
The warm and balmy breeze,
Like winged lustres sporting
Amid the balmy trees.

And lands that live in story,
Where deeds of bold renown,
In fay and legend hoary,
Have won a deathless crown;
Where gray tradition lingers
O'er tomb and classic fane,
Which Time's effacing fingers
Have touched with hallow'd strain.

But O, to me far dearer,
And lovelier each morn;
The homely landscape nearer,
The place where I was born.
And were I, like the swallow,
The wide world doom'd to roam,
My heart, unchanged, would follow
The path that leads to home.

VARIETY.

THE CASE OF THE LATE REV. JASON WHITMAN.—We copy from the Portland Advertiser the following communication, signed by Dr. E. Clark, giving an account of an almost incredible case of malformation, found in making a post-mortem examination of the late Rev. Jason Whitman:

"The case of the late lamented Rev. Jason Whitman, who died in this city of pleurisy, has excited more than usual interest. It was known to his friends that from early infancy he had suffered from a peculiar cough, and copious mucopurulent expectoration. He seemed predisposed to pleurisy, from which he had suffered several attacks. The peculiar symptoms of his case led him to suspect there might be some malformation, which must preclude the hope of perfect health; and he expressed the wish, that at his decease, a post-mortem examination might be made. It is believed that a short description of this wonderful case may be interesting to your readers.

The examination was made by myself, in the presence of Drs. S. Weed, A. Rea, Wm. Wood, J. T. Gilman, J. T. G. Davis, M. Dodge, and L. Fitch; and Wm. Willis and Martin Gore, Esqs.

When the lungs were exposed, they were observed to be united by old and firm adhesions, laterally, to the pleura covering the ribs—and below to the diaphram. These adhesions gave proofs of previous attacks of inflammation. At the interior part of the left lung was a deposit of pus—the result of the last attack of disease. This was contained in a small sack, formed by the pleura of the lungs on the one side, and of the ribs on the other side, and the only part in both lungs not previously bound to contiguous parts by strong adhesions. The two lobes of the left lung filled the left cavity, having its apex or small end inclined to the right, and not towards the left side, as in the natural position. The lung has three lobes; in this case there were only two—the place of the third being occupied by the heart.

The liver was in the left side, of nearly natural size, and perfectly reversed form—suited to the left and not to the right hypochondrium. The position of the stomach was reversed, the small end to the left, and the large end towards the right side. The spleen and larger end of the stomach occupied the place usually assigned to the liver. The large intestines, always found on the right, were situated in the left side of the abdomen, and passing from left to right, instead of their natural reversed direction, from right to left. The sigmoid flexure, always in the left, was in this case, found in the right side. All the organs of the abdomen were healthy, and their form perfect, but reversed. The great omentum, or caul, was wanting. The other organs examined were natural in form and situation.

It was a matter of regret that time did not allow us to pursue the examination of the arteries, as peculiarities in his pulse had been observed during life, which might perhaps have found a solution. So strange a natural position of so many important organs was never before seen by any of the physicians who witnessed the examination."

A melancholy misery occurred in this city a few days since. A widow who unfortunately for them was the mother of six children, found refuge in a dilapidated dwelling in one of the lanes. The youngest of the children fell ill and died. The whole family were in a state of the utmost destitution, and the disease rapidly mastered the young orphan's energies. A coffin was begged. Coffin and corpse would have been borne, perhaps, without the mother's assistance, to some graveyard near. But she had lived at a distance of many miles from this city, and in the burial ground of her native place her friends were interred. The distance was far, and as few would consent to carry a coffin containing a stranger so far unnecessarily, the poor mother resolved to bear it herself. She actually did so. She had it placed on her back, and slowly and wearily she bore it away, reached the graves of her kindred, scratched a trench, we have heard, with her hands, and thus consigned to the earth where she wished they should rest, the remains of her offspring. She returned to her orphans. A second took sick, died quickly, like the other; like the other was placed in a charity coffin, and conveyed in the same way, by the unfortunate mother, to the same place of burial, and buried in like manner by her own hands. She returned again. A third child took sick, died speedily also, was stretched in a coffin procured from the charitable, borne away as before by the sorrowing mother, and interred near to the other two by the hapless poor creature's almost excoriated hands. She returned a third time. A fourth child was ill; fell a victim as quickly as each of the others, was coffined by charity, and carried off and laid by the mother beside her three other children. She came back to her wretched apartment. A fifth child was seized by the malady, a fifth coffin procured, a fifth wearisome journey made alone by the mother, and a fifth body consigned to the earth, there, at all events, no longer to feel the pangs of disease, or the slow wasting progress of unalleviated hunger.—Limerick Examiner.

The Norwich Mercury mentions that Wombwell's elephant, which was supposed to be more than 100 years old, died of extreme age on Thursday fortnight.

A few days ago, a benevolent druggist, in Lincolnshire, administered chloroform to a pig, which rendered it insensible whilst it was slaughtered.

The Belfast Protestant Journal says that a snuff-taker, living at Lurgan, lately blew his nose with such violence as to force one of his eyes out on his cheek, but it has since been restored to its place.

It has been computed that the land of the globe would be equal to the support of fifteen times the number of its present inhabitants, or might sustain a population of fifteen thousand millions.
