The Courier.

The following is that impassioned part of Dr. HARTT's Lecture, to which we alluded in our last, and which was received with rapturous applause.

EXTRACT FROM A LECTURE ON
THE PRESS,
Delivered by Dr. HARTT, of Fredericton,
In the Hall of the Mechanics' Institute, on Friday the 19th instant.

Thus it may truly be said that darkness, intellectual and moral, overspread the earth. Knowledge was shut out from the people, and rigorously imprisoned in Universities and Cloisters. The Press appeared! With gigantic strength it seized the bars—it burst the gates—and forth issued a flood of light! On, on, with the cataract's speed, went that impetuous flood! On, on, from palace to hamlet, from city to city, from village to village, from country to country—Tyranny trembled at the sight, and from its strongholds sent out the imperious mandate, "Hitherto shalt thou come, and no further"—still in proud defiance on it went. Then Science and Literature awoke from the slumber of ages, and began afresh their splendid career; and Religion cast off with indignation her rusty shackles, and resumed her long-forgotten mission to bless the human race. A new era burst upon the world! The discoveries of philosophy, the treasures of history, the beauties of poetry, the doctrines of human rights, the principles of political economy, and the sacred truths of Scripture were at last brought home to the rich and to the poor. What would Galileo, and Newton, and Bacon, and Locke, and Grotius, and Klopstock, and Milton, and Shakespeare, and Rollin, and Robertson, and Addison, and Johnson, and Smith, and Bentham, and all their mighty compeers, have accomplished, had it not been for this wonderful invention? Their lofty intellects, overpowered by the universal death-shade of ignorance, would probably have lain dormant, or wasted their energies upon the puerilities of a false philosophy, a corrupted tradition, or a miserable superstition; or if they had been able to burst through the awful gloom, and reach the light of truth, their productions, engraved on dusty parchment, and consigned to the shelves of a few costly libraries, would have served only to gratify the curiosity of the wealthy schoolman, or the haughty priest. And what would the heroic champions of pure Christianity have done? With resistless energy they might have assailed the citadel of error, and won a temporary triumph; but how soon would their opponents have returned with unnumbered squadrons—hurled them from their proud positions, and re-established themselves upon their ancient towers?

When we look abroad upon the world, we are struck with astonishment at the signs of an advanced civilization which meet our view: the days of ignorance, and dullness, and stagnation, are fast passing away. This is the age of Literature, the age of Books, and Schools, and Colleges; the schoolmaster is indeed abroad, exerting a power greater than that of the statesman, or the warrior: a power which shall determine the temporal, aye, and in some measure, the spiritual destiny of nations. There never was a time when the minds of men were so thoroughly awakened to the importance of knowledge; the great truth is beginning to command universal belief, that the race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong; that it is not by bones and muscles that the work of human advancement is to be carried on; that individual and national prosperity, in a high degree, can only be secured by pressing intellect into the service, as the great and principal instrumentality.

Even we in this Province, though slow to wisdom, have at length yielded our assent; and a general inspection of schools, an elaborate report, a new bill, and the introduction of the Normal system, have followed as the immediate result. There is one thing, however, which we still need, and to which I trust I may be permitted to allude, and that is, the adoption of the principle of taxation; without which, I am persuaded, we may never expect an efficient system of education. But this is a digression: I was speaking of the literary character of the age. To what, then, may we ascribe this literary character?—most obviously, TO THE PRESS.

This is also a practical age; the age of invention, of glorious progress! The old order of things is rapidly yielding to another and a better system. No longer are we satisfied with former methods, and antiquated appliances. Our watchword is, Onward! and on we go, searching through all the chambers of nature for new forces, new elements, that we may yoke them to the car of improvement, and make them subserve the interests and enjoyments of man. And behold the proofs of our success! Whether we survey the land or the ocean; whether we contemplate the wonders of art in the great city, or roam with curious eye over the fields of the husbandman, everywhere we perceive, as if written with a sunbeam, evidences of the influence of a new dispensation.

Whence came that wondrous ship, which, like a great leviathan spouting fire, goes dashing on o'er mountain wave and billow, defying alike the fury of the storm, and the more deceitful dangers of the quicksand and the breaker? And this, its earthly image, whence came it?—this rattling car, which, swifter than the race-horse, and untirable, whirls along, carrying its cumbrous load. And yonder wires, which, from country, to country like the lightning's flash, convey tidings of joy or sorrow: whence came they? And whence those dingy structures which hold in their bosoms the machinery that supplies with manufactures the whole habitable earth? And whence that rich harvest home, so far surpassing in abundance all that was known of yore? You tell me it is science! 'tis all the march of science! But why, I ask, did not science accomplish this hundreds of years ago? Nature has not changed; she was not more niggardly to past generations than to us; she held in her vast storehouse then the same magnificent materials, the same engines of gigantic strength. She gave also to the men of those times the same powers of mind, curiosity as prying, ingenuity as inventive, genius as profound. What, then, has made us to differ? I answer—the Press! The Press—yes, 'tis the general diffusion of knowledge which develops intellect and gives it a practical tone; which stimulates enquiry, causes the action of mind upon mind, furnishes to each succeeding age the full benefit of the acquisitions of the past, and thus induces perpetual advancement.

This too is a Religious age. I know that there are some who differ from me upon this point—who think that the Church is degenerating, and is likely very soon to be given over exclusively to vanity and sin.

One looks back with fond regret to the zeal of the Fathers; another, to the stern severity of the Puritans; for myself, with all due deference to the piety of past ages, my own decided conviction is, that in no period of the history of the world has there been so much true charity (which I take to be the essence of all religion) as at the present time. At any rate there is one fact which will not be disputed, viz: That we possess greater facilities for the attainment of religious knowledge than was ever enjoyed by the most favored of our ancestors.—The depths of divinity have been explored, and the press has poured forth works upon every branch of the subject in rich profusion.

And there is one task in connection with this matter in which this great agent has been engaged for years, and which above all other considerations entitles it to the undying gratitude of mankind. I refer to the noble project of presenting to every man, whether Jew or Gentile, Barbarian, Scythian, Bond, or Free, every man who will receive it, a copy of the Sacred Scriptures.

This is the age of Liberty: her sacred voice is on the wind; it comes to us from every quarter. From the land of Britain, our own loved land, her favorite home, it comes, in a loud, glad, heartfelt song of joy, thanksgiving, and praise.

From the neighbouring States it comes with a merry shout, yet mingled now and then with a licentious laugh, and ever and anon there is a pause, and we hear the deep, deep groan of the Southern Slave.

From the old haunts of European despotism it comes like volleys of thunder, in harsh, terrific tones of complaint, defiance, and desperate determination.

Even from the seven-hilled city it comes with an occasional whisper of hope and ultimate triumph.

What then has given to liberty this mighty impulse, this unparalleled energy? The agencies are numerous, but chief and foremost stands The Press; the Press! which has ever been the irreconcileable foe of tyranny; The Press! which has ever been the palladium of liberty! Knowledge is incompatible with oppression. The people who understand their rights, never, never will be slaves! no matter how strong the chain that binds them; no matter how long they may have groaned beneath its weight; the moment they learn the essential dignity and inalienable inheritance of man; that moment they are free! The history of the past is pregnant with this truth. Take one example: contemplate the French Revolution of 1790. The State and the Church had both grown grey in tyranny: the people were sunk in profound degradation; uneducated, uncared for, unfed; receiving no recognition from the Government, except in the way of interminable taxation. This was their miserable lot! Universal bankruptcy and famine prevailed.—In this dark hour Philosophism arose.

I may not call it a sun, nor yet a star; still it was a light; it served to expose corruption and error,—to lay bare the hideous deformities of oppression, and to reveal in some degree, the indestructible claims and privileges of humanity:—and this was enough!—From the depths of their wretchedness, the masses arose like the heavings of a mighty Earthquake—with their brawny arms they seized the pillars of despotism, and the huge fabric with terrific crash fell crumbling to the earth! Yes; 'twas the writings of Voltaire and his brother Philosophers, forming though they did, so strange a compound of truth and error, light and darkness; the golden head, with the clay foot of the image—I say it was those writings, sent forth by a shackled Press, which gave the first impulse to that tremendous movement, which evoked the first notes of that frightful war cry, that startled the King upon his throne, and the Nobles in their palaces—which mar
