THE LAW OF USURY.—As this is a subject of much importance to the mercantile community, we copy, by request, from a late number of the Head Quarters, the decision of the Judges on a motion for a new trial in a case which was recently tried at Fredericton. Judge Carter, in delivering the judgment of the Court, went very fully into the question, shewing what might be considered as usury, as also what circumstances might come in to alter the character of the transaction. Although leave was given for a new trial in the present case, we understand that no further proceedings will be had, the parties having settled the matter to the satisfaction of the Bank.

THE BANK OF BRITISH NORTH AMERICA VS. CHAS. FISHER.

Trinity Term, 13th Victoria.—Fredericton.

CARTER J. delivered the judgment of the Court.

On a very careful consideration of the facts of this case, which on material points coming out in the evidence of both sides (and that the evidence of the two persons between whom the original transaction took place) seem scarcely controverted, and on a review of the several authorities bearing on the question of usury, we are all of opinion that a rule for a new trial must be made absolute; not because the case was an improper one for a jury to decide on, but because one very material consideration which would necessarily influence the finding of the jury, on which indeed we think the question must mainly turn, was not brought so distinctly under the notice of the jury by the learned judge, as appears to us ought to have been done. We think it cannot be maintained that the purchase and sale of the Bills of Exchange of £700 sterling in August, 1847, and the loan made by the Bank on the discount of Henry Fisher's note of £1000, endorsed by the defendant, on which the alleged charge of usury arises, were separate and distinct transactions; but the evidence shews they formed part of the same agreement made at different times; at all events there is sufficient evidence for the jury to find that this was the substance of the transaction; for although the amount of the note of £1000, deducting upon discount interest for the time it had to run, was placed to the credit of Henry Fisher, before the Bills were delivered to him, and he was afterwards charged with the amount of the Bills still it was only so placed to be used in a particular way, as previously agreed on, and not to be drawn out as cash. In this respect, therefore, this case differs from the leading English case, Hammett vs. Yea, 1 B. & P., 144, although much of the reasoning of the Judges in that case may apply to the present; still it was one fact relied on there, that after the discount it was at the option of the party to have either cash, or Bills equivalent to cash, or to have the amount placed to his credit.

That the actual Bank cash rate of Exchange on London, at Fredericton, at the time of this transaction, was 8 per cent. premium (so called) seems clear, and it would necessarily follow that 10 per cent. was two per cent. higher than Bills could have been bought for at the time with money,—we mean money brought in hand to the Bank, or lying there at the disposal of the applicant, and not procured by way of an accommodation loan at the time from the Bank.

If then it was agreed as a condition of the Bank loaning £1000 (less the discount) to Henry Fisher that he should take part of that sum in Bills of Exchange on London, for £700 sterling, at 10 per cent. premium, whereby Fisher paid £14 sterling more than he would have done if he had been a mere purchaser for cash, and the Bank received that additional profit on the Bills by reason of the loan, as the Bank do thereby apparently gain more than lawful interest, and it is a method whereby more money may be paid for interest than the law allows, it would by inference of law, we think, amount to usury, or at least it might be so found by a jury, unless the excess of premium can be ascribed to any conting
