

COMMUNICATION.

[For the Courier.]

NO. VI.
 Richmond, July 29, 1849.

"Come, O'Leary, I want to hear your story. You have been in the country some time, and your knowledge of things in general must be extensive."

"Faix, yer honor, I should know a thrifle, as it is some twenty-five years since I came to this country, and maybe myself that I have seen this and down in that same old Ireland, be it it was a fine country then, but now it is the other way, but maybe it's poor information to give that same. The first work I did in this Province was to be a school teacher, and the man that was in charge of the school was a great merchant in three or four years afterwards; he got to be chief boss himself, and had parties in the woods, and went home to Scotland to clear money so fast that he commenced to build a town on his own hook—from that he got to building and stowing away, and building Castles in the Air, and such like—faix, his head clerk told me that he would have rebuilt the tower of Babel, had not his creditors come down on his apple cart to the tune of £20,000. But, sure that was to pay my school, for in the days of his glory he had half the people on the river getting out timber and ship knees for him, until scores of them had their farms mortgaged. But some of the old Scotch men saw that lumbering was a bad job, and although their land was nothing to compare with your's, Squire, they commenced farming and living on the produce of their farms, and paid off their mortgages, and they had a good log or 100 bushels of oats to sell, they sold it to Mr. —, who was reputed very rich, and carrying on such a prosperous business, that many thought he was highly favored if he got him to take his thrifle of money on interest, or buy his produce. But as soon as it was known he had failed, the fair was in a twinkling a cinder, and he was left with a lot of condemned ships' knees and chips—the town, the steam mill, and the castles in the air, along with the people's mortgages which had been mortgaged to him, and they had to pay them over again. Many said, and do say still, that it was a benefit to the place, but I still acknowledge, in my own heart, that because the sunk the country in debt and left it. Begorra, Squire, I don't know of more than two or three lumber merchants who have stowed their ground on that river—it is true, there are a few who have stowed up, but the majority of the ruins of some one before them; but it is possible that they will be successful, and will winter down like their predecessors. It seems to me, Squire, that lumbering above all other businesses is carried on without that candour and integrity which should give health to the trade of the Province—it seems a game of hazard that men are engaged in, and cause they get an extensive credit while times are prosperous. Blood and thunder, only think of it, Squire, the very herring, codling and mackerel, used on that river some years back, all came from Montreal or Prince Rupert Island, and thousands of them might be caught at the mouth of the harbour, within sight of the town, and as for gaspeaux, they have been so plenty heretofore that you could hardly find a canoe through them. But what was the use of taking them? They were denounced—There were no men to buy them, and if they did the price would not pay for the salt, and they were kept enormous high, so that men could not put the fish up. But it was done to compel people to keep at the lumbering. In the winter of 1847 I was around there, seeing some of my old acquaintances, and they were really deplorable to see in some parts of the main river many people who, although seventeen and eighteen years ago they were well off, now were completely down and out, and they were the neighbors of those who then were objects of charity, were now in comfortable circumstances. How does this happen? The thing is as plain as the noon day. The parties who then looked the most prosperous, who were lumbering, and had kept on so until the present time, and now their farms are mortgaged, their houses are tumbling down, and hardly a light of glass in them, and stuffed with coal, and they are the neighbors who commenced farming, and kept at it, are comfortable, their houses look neat and smart, and I'm told the old wife has always a "siller" in her pocket. "Well, you owe me the money, and must I and my family starve because you want to keep the flour for your lumbering parties?" "You may get the flour, and be damned," was the reply. "You cannot get the flour, we will pay you in dry goods or iron, or such like." That corn crop absolutely allowed themselves to be used, because the law gave them until the winter of 1848 to pay the money, and the winter was left to shift the best he could for his family until spring."

"Such heartless villainy is the ruin of New-Branswick, O'Leary. It is no wonder we are in a state bordering on barbarism, when men will not pay their honest debts, and that to men in a state of starvation! How can a country prosper, when such shameless transactions take place—it is like a highway robbery, when men dishonor, to the highest of the lowest."

Yours,
 PAUL JONES.
