

Nothing would be easier than to add almost infinitum to this list of the happy results of trying. The very idea has itself accomplished much, but acting on the suggestion is very much more. I beseech the reader, in reference to all that is good, and elevating, and useful, to try. — From the school-mate.

A HUMAN BEING WITH NOTHING TO DO.

Most miserable, worthy of most profound pity, is such a being! The most insignificant object in nature becomes a source of envy; the birds warble on every tree, in ecstasy of joy; the tiny flower, hidden from all eyes, sends forth its fragrance of full happiness; the mountain stream, sparkling with its sparkling and murmuring of pure delight. The object of their envy is accomplished, and their life glides forth in harmonious work. O plant! O stream! worthy of admiration, of worship, to the wretched idler! Here are powers ye never dreamed of—faculties divine, eternal; a head to think, but nothing to concentrate the thoughts; a heart to love, but no object to bathe with the living tide of affection; a hand to do, but no work to be done; talents unexercised, capacities undeveloped, a human life thrown away—wasted as water thrown forth in the desert. Birds and flowers, ye are gods to such a mockery of life! Who can describe the fearful void of such an existence, the yearning for objects, the self-reproach for wasted powers, the weariness of idly life, the longing of pleasure, of frivolity, and the fearful consciousness of degrading life—a spiritual paralysis which hinders all response to human interest—when enthusiasm ceases to arouse, and noble deeds no longer call forth the tears of joy, when the world becomes a blank, humanity a far sound, and no life but the heavy burdening weight of personal hopelessness and desolation. Happier far is the toiling drudge who coins body and soul for a few poor shilling that can only keep his family in a long starvation; he has hope unceasingly to light him, a duty to perform, a spark of love within that cannot die; and wretched, weary, outman as his life may be, it is of royal worth—it is separated by the immeasurable distance of life and death from the poor, perhaps pampered wretch, who is cursed for having no work to do.—American Journal.
